If Squid Game was real, the creators would have to pay diyyah to the victim's family who would probably forgive them.

If it was like Roman gladiatorial games, and not authorised by the state, then 10 years in jail and/or death.

Murder has a minimum sentence of five years, though this is not limited to imprisonment. Those being punished for murder are first placed in a rehabilitation programme. If they succeed in this, their sentence is changed to allow more freedom and reintegrating them back into society. While if it fails, then they will remain in prison before another attempt of rehabilitation is made a year or more later.

It's illegal to steal or break the signboard, but the burning itself is not treated as worse than just breaking it. So the punishment for stealing and breaking the signboard is a fee of fifty talars.

Lying in the court.

Not punished. In fact, we usually reward the impoverished by paying

It will probably get you a hefty fine and prison time, both to you and the spy in question, although that would be the case with spying on anyone, on the other hand, Politicians need to be transparent on their operations as politicians, so if you wanted to know who was financing them and the likes that information is publicly available, spying on a politician would mean spying on them on their free time and private matters.

Such a crime wouldn't be possible here, not in the same sense - "traditional gender roles" don't exist in anything resembling the same social constructs they are IRL. This is due to our 'verse's having cultures that are fairly divorced from IRL, especially when it comes to things like religion, marriage and sexuality, and gender norms. To give a striking example of this, it would not be seen as outside the norm for a woman to be a knight - I don't just mean the title either, I mean a career military shock troop fighting in service of your noble lord, decked out in the finest arms and armor.

The farcical and misogynist idea that "women belong in the kitchen" is very alien here; ideas of masculinity and femininity in our 'verse are not so rigid. Our 'verse largely does not have a feminist movement or specialized LGBT+ culture not because such things have been stamped out, but because women and LGBT+ people have never really been considered an "other", and systemic prejudice against them in our 'verse is by and large not a thing. They have always been a part of our religions, and accepted in our cultures, and so there aren't really "traditional roles" in anything remotely resembling the same sense as IRL.

If anyone did attempt that on our turf, and attempted such a thing seriously, well... we would make an example of them, and all their co-conspirators. Mutilated bodies strung up in a public place tends to send quite the striking message that such behavior won't be tolerated.
