And while we're on the topic of military cliches, what is it with nations' military units that are very clearly outnumbered, outflanked, outgunned, surrounded on all sides by enemy troops, getting pounded by artillery, and cut off from support... that always end up staging a breakout at the last minute and going on to inflict massive enemy casualties? And if I'm being honest, refusing to take losses in combat remains one of the biggest tropes in II and NS RPs, even if it's one of the most egregious ones of all.

To that end -- big shoutout to Aureunterra here who was willing to let his entire nation be dismantled with massive military defeats for the sake of a good story.

I did that for my WW2 factbooks, explained more as desperation because a naval limitations treaty handicapped my island nations usual means of self-defense, so LP loopholed it's way around rearmament by militarizing long-range state of the art civilian airliners to blast would-be invaders away.

I still need to update a lot of things though, namely by mentioning how downgraded unpressurized variants were used over Germany to make it more economically feasible.

Hey hey, LP here: Too burnt out with this nation to make new lore or fix macrohistorical longue durée alt-his inconsistencies, too clingy to let it die.

I try to give myself decent levels of air power. I grew up with Ace Combat so fighter jet cool and I gave my air force Gripens because they're as good as any equivalent modern fighter (although military realism thread will tell you they're equivalent to a 1980s F-16 because it's not F-35) but cheap and spamable. Personally though, I'm surprised we don't see more drones in NS air forces given the success Turkey has had with them recently. Although if you listen to the military realism thread they'll tell you it's only because Syrian air defence crews are poorly trained and the Armenians didn't even have their air defence turned on.

I think the military realism thread trying to shoot holes in something that's been proven effective IRL because it's not hyper modern or because a country they don't like did it can become a cliché at this point.

I mean fundamentally drones are rather - if not experimental - young, relatively speaking. They're an entirely new concept, they are to air forces what tanks were to armies worldwide. People aren't sure whether they are a worthwhile investment yet, and even then to what extent and for what purposes they may reasonably be deployed.

Generally I like Russian planes, which is why my design of "TkaN" planes I made for SR's lore is somewhat based off of the Flankers (with the latest being a horrific amalgamation of the F-22 and Su-57). More importantly, though, I just see air power to be domineering in the long run. Command of the skies is greatly underrated; that said, very interesting you used Gripen. I'm not a huge fan, personally, I'm a bit iffy with single-engine fighters and they can be a bit finicky at times. That said, I understand why people like using Gripen - they're most certainly tried and tested.

I'm not really sure about how domineering air power will actually come to be - historically we do see it being used as a seriously devastating tool, but even with modern-day bunker-busters and loitering missiles the defining cases of modern air power have always been in supporting roles. That's where they shine; you still need boots on the ground to occupy territory after you bomb the other guys into ash.

I think the last time paratroopers were airdropped was in Vietnam. Nowadays they use Helicopters. We've learned the limitations of airdropping supplies, tanks, and people. Tanks need to be really light to survive the shock and weapons have to be shortened and lose effectiveness to be air dropped and that also comes with a injury and fatality rate of being air dropped out of a moving plane (broken bones, etc). That and air drops tend to be off target and have the likelihood of being captured by the enemy before the ground force acquires it. Air control of the immediate air space is also needed. As much as I'm a big fan of the 82nd in WWII, that method is more or less outdated by the 70's.

What I do want to see is more skeleton crews sent to do suicide missions with no insignia and are not expected to come out alive. I avoid personal involvement in war RP's though so you're not going to see me making it.

Paratroopers have been used many times since WW2, although mostly in COIN operations and fighting guerrilla forces. However, I personally believe there are many conventional warfare scenarios where modern day paratroops or helicopter drops would still be very useful, island warfare for one

There's too much risk of the planes getting blasted out of the sky and taking an entire brigade's worth of troops with them before reaching the drop zone these days. If the enemy has a poor air defence network or the attacker is successful in suppressing enemy air defence then I can see airborne forces getting used.

I see special forces being underused on NS a lot actually. People will maybe generically commit commandos or some other form of SOF to a conflict but won't talk about them doing any kind of direct action raids or behind the lines unconventional warfare stuff and rather focus on the tanks and infantry trying to punch through the frontline. Either that or use their SOF as shock troops on the frontline rather than doing actual special operations with them.

Hmm today I will use flak cannons on unsuspecting paratroopers, shredding them to pieces. Then I will get sent to a war crimes tribunal when I find out that they were actually just aircrews escaping from their burning transport aircraft with the intent to surrender upon reaching the ground.

I said they stopped after Vietnam, I forgot Panama and Granada was a thing. Now reading up on the Granada debacle again, parachute on a island sounds like a bad idea, especially with non steerable parachutes. Drowning is one concern.

It's kind of funny, this is almost exactly why machine guns were dismissed by a lot of European armed forces prior to WWI. I don't know though, nothing says "god-like warrior" than literally just clicking on an entire tank company to delete it with loitering munitions and precision missiles.
