Overexplanation. I know, you need all the lore and worldbuilding you can get, and that is okay, I do that all the time. I have so many details at times, I know that feeling when you started writing a few words, then it snowballed into every single little details about the bullets the guns use.

Now and then, I do feel that we can and should get away with not explaining some bits, and explain it as a "mystery / magic / exercise left to the reader." Think of it like Star Wars before the sequels (the Force, or the midichlorians). A bit of an overused example, yes, but at times, it does not have to be hard sci-fi. Add a bit of magic and mysticism into your mix! ♥

Tbh, there's people who go a little too far with this and just say "eh, it just works" for how they were able to teleport 8,000 guys clad in plate armor with muskets into a battlefield and then proceed to wipe the floor with them as artillery fails to make a dent in their armor... And with basically no resistance in their movements either.

Granted that falls in line with godmodding, but it does happen at times...

Munkcestrian dodging is just a martial art.

Ah yes, like the art of "ignoring rules and forum etiquette" which is a common art of people who don't know how to make posts, much less even bother with the effort.

We know walking is possible because we do it every day. Considering how much time you spend on NS trolling the entirety of F7 and every decent RPer ever, you might not have, but we have.

Would you like to refer me to an instance of someone actually managing to dodge a bullet?

First of all, I do not troll. Second of all, I am not sure you would like to compare the time I spend on NS to the amount of time that you and others spend on NS. 'Dodge a bullet' is literally in the dictionary. I used to do it all the time with Nerf bullets when I was younger. Also, as demonstrated by Mythbusters, it's literally just a matter of reaction time.

Yes, it is a matter of reaction time, as in getting the fuck out of the way before the other guy fires, not as in dodging during or after the trigger pull.

And you do troll, we see it all the time. You went in the fucking military realism thread to argue in favor of your bullshit, along with trying to enter serious RPs with your "But muh dodging" wankery. Do everyone a favor and fuck off, please and thank you.

The video states it's also impossible for a human to react that quickly, as the fastest reaction time was nearly double what was needed to dodge a bullet at 250 yards.

I kinda disagree with the Force and midichlorians, while I think that was a bit of a silly thing in the prequels I would say that in general the prequels enhanced star wars and made it into the great thing i love today, but this isn't the thread for that at all xd

I definitely agree with you, some people overexplain too much. Which isn't a bad thing in in of itself, but I find that it makes reading their factbooks a bit of a chore sometimes. Like when you're reading an overview factbook, and the history section could probably be 4 factbooks just by itself. I kinda envy that kind of level of detail because I don't possibly know how people manage to write that much, but also it makes some things hard to read. I love hard magic systems, but what I really love about them is internal logic and consistency rather than mountains of detail. To use an overused example, the system in Avatar the last Airbender is great because it sets up interesting rules and makes the viewer wonder what things are or aren't possible, and also distinguishes it from a lot of other magic systems. However I think soft magic systems can be great as well (I'm currently using a soft magic system for my nation, at least for now), and I think more people should utilise them. Similar things could apply to scifi concepts and also things like military I think.

A post-apocalyptic nation located entirely within a megastructure amidst a burning Earth, in a world where reality barely holds together and magic arises from the cracks.

You asked for an example of someone dodging a bullet. Nothing about it not being a toy bullet. And with a quick enough reaction time you could also dodge during or after, so you still don't have an argument anyway. Plausible? No. Possible? Yes. Now please stop resorting to foul language, a sign of losing an argument, just because you are losing the argument.

As for your final point, the Bee Movie opens with "According to all known laws of aviation, there is no way a bee should be able to fly." This, of course, is incorrect. But by your logic, that as a video states (as opposed to demonstrates before you try to make a false equivalence) something it must be true, so would this factoid from the aforementioned Bee Movie.

I said bullet. A Nerf Bullet is not, by definition, a bullet.

a metal projectile for firing from a rifle, revolver, or other small firearm, typically cylindrical and pointed, and sometimes containing an explosive.

Also, the concept of cutting the human reaction time in half to perform this action is in fact impossible. First, you'd need to be able to register the muzzle flash. Then, perform the action of moving out of the way of the bullet. Keep in mind, this was done at 250 yards, equivalent to 228 meters, the outer third of the operation range of an AK-47, and a distance that is generally reserved for snipers or wildly inaccurate potshots.

If even 250 yards is dubious, at which length the enemy will have proper concealment and most likely a suppressor/flash hider to minimize the visible muzzle flash, anything below 150 yards would be completely impossible.

Your point is not factual. A human cannot physically react that quickly, at all. You'd have to cut the reaction time of the average human in half just to dodge at 250 yards, and your body simply cannot move and operate quick enough to do that.

Munk, why don't you try having a gun shot at you so you can test your idiotic theory about dodging. Go on, try it, I'm sure you can do it. Frankly, I think most NSers would appreciate the aftermath of that attempt.

Stop being an Agnostic, because the only way that's going to happen is an act of god.

And by gun, I mean a real, functioning, firing, gun, since this apparently needs to be clarified with you.

I love the thought that the real reason for the relationships and diplomatic affairs of this Earth's real life nations we live in are due to the spirits of said nations conversing outside of this dimension, and the drama that ensues as those spirits make friendships and enemies.
