Now what about a flag that incorporates flat and simple design elements and symbolism associated with a character, but not the character themselves?

Ain't that the basis of Heraldry?

I wonder if Mary-Sue-esque countries exist on here? It'd be like:

- Kicked about by major powers (or at least they try to)
- combines about 70 government types but is still stable
- Good at basically everything
- Has an untapped mega source of rare material like uranium
- Will be hella OP in roleplays, and force things to go their way

Some people think Hatsunia is like that, but only because it's specifically supposed to be the opposite of most of the issues Japanese society is criticized for (like xenophobia and outdated business practices).

Ideal countries aren't necessarily perfect (Mary Sue) polities, Hatsunia. Anyways, applying character terms to political bodies is a very weird practice. A perfect country is either deliberate, making them a utopia, or the result of bad writing. In the latter's case it is the author failing to deliver the consequences of a nation's policy or diplomatic action, or failing to come up with a believable history and circumstances for a utopian society.

For the former, it's a form of literature whose purpose is to portray a better state of society that we should all strive to achieve. A good utopian nation is one that tells a story of a society which has overcome the problems it faces in an engaging sort of way, entailing a demand for novel or at least creative and semi-original takes to what is a very saturated niche of the NationStates forums.

A re-occurring cliché is seeing something (very obviously) based on fictional scenarios being called unrealistic. It's as much a cop-out meta response akin to disliking a leader in an AL thread for being "anime artstyle".

Combine Interuniversal wrote:

failing to come up with a believable history and circumstances for a utopian society.

In recent months, that is exactly what Hatsunia's lore was criticized for - that there was no struggle involved in obtaining a egalitarian society, and that the government just decided to support gender and racial equality out of pure idealism so on a meta level, social issues wouldn't become "deeply rooted." Some people offered constructive criticism by saying that Hatsunese society would realistically have been more bigoted in the past, but overcame it through protests and other forms of activism and resulting government reforms, thus I revised the lore to be where it is today. And it does seem more meaningful that way.

Guess I'm a marysuetopia for having deep reserves of metallic ores and connections to several countries while swatting away influence from the US and China given they are part of a small number of global powers still kicking around, while my small nation has to stockpile nukes to keep them off the front yard.

Yeap.

Totally true.

Wow.

Truly, I am an awful writer and even worse at world-building.

/heavy sarcasm.

In all honesty, this just seems like a general and broad oversight... That fails to attack the main issue of mary-sue style countries. That is, the lack of any minor internal conflict, the seemingly perfect rise overnight, plus blatant abuse of nonexistent factbooks to tie things down so you get stupid arguments over how a country the size of New York City is able to harbor an advanced, well equipped military the size of China's own population, in spite of having a population smaller than that of most Canadian cities.

It's carbon... it's one of the most common elements around. The hard part of Graphene is in figuring out a means of reliably mass-producing it, which was a cross-tribal competition that lasted the better part of two decades... with many casualties.

I've always maintained that having a nation that constantly talks about how perfect and amazing it is is what makes a nation a MarySuetopia tbh.

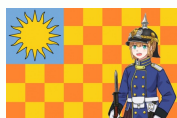

Like it's the difference between 'My nation is a developed first-world nation with a fairly high standard of living' and 'My nation is the most developed nation in the entire world and it's all so perfect here, everyone wishes they could live here, our largest city makes places like New York, Tokyo, Paris, or Beijing look like a joke and has ten times as economic power as any of those cities and was voted the greatest city in the world in 2012, 2013, 2014, 2015, 2016, 2017, 2018, 2019, and 2020. We have no crime whatsoever because of how well-funded everything is and everyone's lives are so great, so why would anyone want to commit any crimes? It makes no sense.'

I mean it's not that strong, since its strength doesn't scale up effectively (ironically it's more akin to glass, but far more expensive IRL)... But yea, it would depend on the cost of manufacture and the process, which can be extremely complex and requires very careful control of various factors to get it to work.

Yeap. I never boast much about my nation beyond "Oh yea, the manufacturing sector is going strong, yeap! And uh... The cars are good too!" but never more than that. Hell, I almost never offer a baseline because it's more akin to saying "I got 95 on the test!" when everyone else got scores varying from 90-100 on the same test... It's quite average, maybe a little exceptional, but still painfully average.

I should've been more specific with this. Basically what I tried to say was that a Suelandia would be a perfect nation that has been perfect for all it's history and never failed. Every country has had its ups and downs, and there is a difference between a 'first world, economically prosperous nation' and a 'we are literally perfect in every way' nation. (The only exception to this rule being that if you have a corrupt North Korean style dictatorship, then pretending you are perfect is fine)
