"Democratic leaders have been shown to be nothing more than spineless welps in the face of the teutonic invader which has spread their cancer from their beloved "Germania" to what they call now, their "Reichkommissariat Moskowien". Even the famed British Empire folded before them and found their isles broken, Scotland independent, Wales independent, and Cornwall taken by the G*man invaders. Their dear king Edward, nothing more than a Teutonic puppet. Their ways will not last long if they do not strengthen their government and military, The USSR under Bukharin failed the "first" trial against the teutonics, then the West Russian Revolutionary Front and their dear "Peoples' Marshal" failed and is still licking his wounds from the "second" trial.. "Beowulf is exactly the sort of pretentious university professor who had become the ruling class of the Socialist Commonwealth, though he is less hypocritical with his principles than they were. Perhaps, that is due to his world being far different from our own."

In response to his claims: No, my definition of the common man isn't exclusive. You literally just need to be white. And, it hardly matters considering that the vast majority of the population is white. And, how does having a defined nation damper solidarity? I mean, isn't some universalist sense of solidarity merely a vapor, while one based on nation and class is more real?

And, how did your world, so different from Earth, manage to replicate the convoluted development of fascism that ours did? I wouldn't go into details about the development of Fascism in Italy, and how it practically has no meaning due to the vastly differing ideas of the people who took the label. Really, that would keep the attention away from you.

I wonder if you'd consider Azania fascist then? They're a racial nationalist state that claims to be socialist, though honestly they're about as socialist as China is. Which is to say, not really.

Honestly, I wonder why so many university 'socialists' are so eager to worship the negro. It's honestly starting to become a meme at this point."

"Its good to see that things are finally starting to look up in regards to how we view each other. sure, there are still things that both of us will have differences in, that is to be expected. but then this whole universe would be pretty boring if everyone viewed things in the same way. Peaceful, but still very boring. Anyway, to keep things going, i have learned to appreciate his reasons for his traditional and conservative views. while i am more of a left leaner myself, i try to keep some balance between the two. his view on marriage is also very traditional being that of one man and woman, not something i wholly agree with, but i do agree that it should only be between two souls, any more than that just feels false and very disloyal. I also like his view on racial equality and how he describes it. i also really want to see this mechanical spider based air conditioning unit that he made, oh, and the puppy, definitely the puppy, i have a real soft spot for young fluffies. Overall, i am happy to see that our initial hostilities have mellowed out and that he has acknowledged that things got off on the wrong foot. it has given me some hope that we can actually get along. for my opinion to go all the way from hostile to neutral (leaning-positive) is extremely rare, but most welcomed."

"Exarch Sera is... quite fascinating to me, honestly. She's an idealist. I don't care for her ideals. Idealists don't tend to survive out here in this cosmos for very long, unless they wise up before they meet whatever destroys them. Yet... it seems she is defying this trend. For once, we have an idealist whose godlike powers can actually hold themselves up across time and avert subversion and manipulation. She even seems true to her word, and doesn't show signs of betraying her own cause. I am impressed by this fortitude, as meaningless as her personality and goals actually are to me.

Unfortunately, I do not believe she would have anything to do with me or my services - quite the contrary, I'm far more likely to sell my poison to one of her enemies. Given that she also probably isn't given over to working with terrorists, I doubt she would seek some of my more benign products, even if they do seem benign. Given all of these factors, we are neutral to one another under the very best of circumstances."

“I’m not sure what you’re talking about with the origin of fascism, since it fairly clearly was started by - oh, wait, I see what’s happening here! I’m not speaking English, if that makes any sense. In all likelihood, what’s translating my words is picking by-words to minimize explanation time. Regardless, what you’re reading as ‘fascism’ has a much less convoluted origin in our world, instead coming from an Orshalic right-wing activist just trying to codify his beliefs. To try and call it by the word we use here, it’s called ‘Bashalism,’ much in the same way that socialist thought in your world is called ‘Marxism.’”

EDIT: "As for some of your replies, when I called your solidarity a vapor, I merely meant it was fake. If your definition of the 'common man' is partially based upon a social construct that actively aids in dividing the working class, then I believe that your idea of 'solidarity' is one meant to create an exclusive club, not help your fellow workingmen. And yes, I would consider any nation engaging in ethnic nationalism to be fascist - or, to translate to the actual word, Bashalist - in this way. To your criticism that I'm some 'big university socialist,' only religious schools teach theology, and the University of St. Botarad is no exception. While socialism was not uncommon there, it was partially due to tyrannical kings' reigns radicalizing the church as a whole, not 'university culture,' for what limited amount that term is worth."

"the only thing i would say is positive about Jim is that he gives a decent amount of freedoms to his people, but i am afraid that is where it ends. Everything else I do not approve of, and he treats the country more like a company. In fact, i would go as far as to suspect that private businesses have more run of the country than he does. i would not call the abolishment of public schools an achievement either. the biggest negative however is his lack of care for the environment. do you seriously expect your people to survive in the long term when you eventually choke them out with the pollution caused by the lack of environmental protections? i hope for the sake of the people of fruit smiles that they elect a more eco friendly presidents, otherwise i will check back in another few hundred years when the country is nothing but a dystopian wasteland where only the corporate rich live comfortably in steel towers above the smog while the poor struggle with their every day lives... my opinion is negative..."

So another god-ruler? How many all-powerful beings rule countries? While I do respect her fierce protectiveness of her country, (interstellar empire?) Ms. Sera's policies are too anti-capitalist for me to support. Yes, corporations can be greedy, but capitalism directs that greed towards selling people quality products. My personal opinion of Ms. Sera is meh, but due to the extreme destructive power of her nation we should really be on good terms with her.

OOC - (I appreciate your eagerness to respond, but Giant Space Wyrms poked you about double-posting already. Now I am poking you as well. It's something that is highly frowned upon in F7.)

"It is clear that Sera is a kind soul. She has provided a post-scarcity society for her people where there is nothing they should lack for want. I have seen many of these societies within my time and some of them now rest within the cradle of the Dominion. Some would say such societies run counter to life and that all you are doing is coddling them.

Those people are imbeciles and are better off ignored. I hold you in high-esteem, to say the least, though I question the decision to maintain pacifism. There are some who simply cannot be talked down."
