That's more than an NS cliche.

If I had to guess it has its origins in writers deciding 'Terran' works better than 'Earthling'.

Here is an extremely annoying cliché: states that are supposed (at least as originally planned by the writer) to encompass both good and bad but eventually turn into a super-duper happy state where everyone is nice to each other and no one (almost) dies

IK you mean Roman, but it kinda sucks. I have only seen one "Space Empire" based around the French and none based on Iberian, Latino, Italian, or Romanian cultures.

Now I am not saying that a Colombian/Mexican-themed Space Empire wouldn't probably just fall into the same cliches, buuuut - it would be based.

Is it just me, or have I seen a disproportionately large amount of countries which basically say "What if Latin America was a global superpower?"

Azteca Mexico no es de América Latina :V

Latino is a cultural classification which they don't fit in any way, shape or form despite their geographic position. They even mention "Latino" as a foreign neighboring culture or as emigres with notable presence IIRC and have a very poignant and accurate disclaimer over the expediency of using "Azteca" and "Mexico" in their name and connotating them when it shouldn't happen; it's historically inaccurate to consider Mexico a continuation of a certain Mesoamerican culture which they base themselves on.

Ngl, you reminded me of how weird the concept of White in the USA must be in Las Palmas' timeline.

If I recall the ethnicity surveys back in the States, the Palmerans/Tohorinese must alternate between European but not White or Hispanic despite being Eurasians(?) and therefore legally White. But in practicality, I imagine that only WASPs count as White in a world where the majority of Southern slaves were MENA people who could pass as White after a bit of mixing.

Foehn Paramilitary Regions wrote:

That's implied with opposition to El Presidente who runs the Spexican Banana Republic despite the place being a desert.
