no. engl*nd was formed in 1066. the "uk" formed in 1707.

Apologies, I should've clarified I was talking about a consistent administration present there. But you are right. And even the administration in England wasn't consistently there, but England as a legal and political body was never absorbed into another nation until the Act Of Union, which was at the behest of English leadership). It's just easier to say UK since the UK is the continuation of the English nation.
