Their more-or-less centralized state requires decentralized options in the expanses of space, where the regional nobility often call the shots depending on their circumstances and even fund expeditions on their own. Ah, sweet sweet memories of the Age of Sail....

Their native population are literal catgirls, and the modern population of Las Palmeras is mostly a mix between the catgirls and humans.

Based on a rough calculation, they have a low dependency ratio (ratio of non productive age population to productive age population), which makes them able to keep their economy stable for a relatively long time.

Their economy is a post-scarcity economy filled with automation and has been a boon for their foreign operations.

Post-war reconstruction did not go well as a nuclear typhoon known as the "First Impact" ravages the island in 1946. Their name was deliberately picked in order to not represent anything in particular.
And they speak Esperanto. Way to go with that 'neutral linguistic foundation.'
Their dominant religion is either 'the best faith' or 'the beast faith,' probably the latter.

Their civil war largely mirrors that of the American Civil War: it began when a newly elected President was seen to threaten the balance of slavery, causing the southern slave-economies to secede into a Confederacy, and ended when a military campaign occupied the rebel capital. In Arcadia, the enslaved people were the Natives, not imported Africans, and after the war the assassination of the President by a pro-slave maniac failed.

Even though they are predominantly religious in nature, all texts --religious or secular-- are carefully preserved, as they consider knowledge in general to be sacred.

They make heavy use of "avatars", which are super-powered physical bodies that they use to interact with in other worlds. Because their leaders have those bodies, we infer they're biological and not synthetic in nature. They're like "doll bodies" for spirits in our myths.

They too, like many NS nations, have a Neko population. They're an island nation in the Mediterranean with heavy Spaniard influences, and from what I understand, Xinjiang seems to be an independent country, Korea is united and India and Pakistan never divided ( although Bangladesh is somehow separated ).
