On HM Empress Julie II of Quaxoglia

"An 'Empress'? Of a democratic nation? My, what an odd quirk for governance. I wonder if she is able to connect with her people despite the social barriers that would separate the bourgeoisie from the common person in such a culture. I too am considered a 'princess' by my people, but its a title I earned from serving them instead of being served. Alas I can relate to such a childhood as hers, I lost my mother before I could know her and my heart goes out to anyone who has to live a life parent-less. Such a lonely childhood, I feel as if we could be best of friends. What is it with over-achievement in the face of losing parents that speaks to people like her and I? Overall I quite like her, the commitment to progress and democracy are also ideals that I champion on behalf of my people. Such a brave woman too, so many children while managing an entire country! Where do you find the time?!"

On Yunru, paramilitary leader

"Hmm, this seems like a breach into an old Earth alternate timeline. Its interesting seeing how that world plays out in its vast derivatives. Thankfully our ancestors managed to leave the place once nuclear Armageddon was initiated but I digress. Yunru, Yunru, what can I say about you? A gifted child, brainwashed by the CCP to fight the red menace? A psykker that would make the nevecian arcanum giddy with excitement? A war heroine who liberated her people from russian state communism, to install,..err..whatever this is. A paranoid leader in a war-torn world, what a disaster. Just another entry in the dead timelines registry."

Alexandra of the United Kingdom

"So, what do we have here, an Empress Kulie II? Well, let's see. For her upbringing, this Empress Julie does seem to have quite an unconventional upbringing, as some might say, even by royalty standards? Granted, I mostly grew up in good old Buckingham Palace but the first three years of my life with my mother in New York was definitely an experience to remember. Now, moving on, her plight and struggles over the undeniably overwhelming media attention she receives on a daily basis is definitely something I could once more recognise and emphasise with, like, for goodness' sake, those story hungry paparazzi, am I right?"

Anyhow, judging by her track record so far as empress of her country, her reign as her country's crowned ruler does seem to be well on the right tracks and all, with all the guaranteed prosperity and harmony her citizens would continue to benefit throughout much of her life"

Ok so what is this? I'm new to this whole opinion thing. So who am I looking at? Alexandra? Are you royalty, you look like royalty? Sitting on your throne while drinking wine. It sounds like a life of luxury. It reminds me of the lifestyle of Emperor Pierre of Burgundy, and that doesn't make me very happy. Wait? You're from the United Kingdom? That used to be a place before the war. So you are a constitutional monarch? A bit like all of the premonitions of the Benelux. This raises another question I have: What purpose do you serve for your people? I mean, I assume that your life-style requires lots of tax-money. Unity? Tradition? Please don't say 'tradition, I've heard enough talk about "tradition" from the people down south. Also can you please explain to me why your picture is in the background of your bio? I can't really read this way, and from what I can manage to read, it seems to be mostly royal claims.

So my final conclusion for Alexandra is that she comes off as a bit elitist and distant from the people. Elitism is one of the things that ensure is one of the common reasons to the start of the war. But maybe that's just because the Beneluxians have left me a bad taste in my mouth for monarchs.

OOC: Yay! A new one!

"In the days of old, there was a tribal Cala who was well respected by those who followed him and was a capable leader in many ways. He had a fatal flaw, however: he suffered from the curse of indecision in military matters. In war, he could not commit fully to offensive or defensive strategies, as he feared that he would be countered by those more experienced than he. This led to him suffering a massive and humiliating defeat in what should have been a minor conflict, as in his efforts to affect the 'right' strategy, he dithered and allowed his enemy to acquire alliances and reinforcements. Because of his refusal to commit, he lost many soldiers of his tribe, and was removed shortly after.

"I speak this story not because I see it in you, but as a warning. Your military commanders are intended to advise you, and affect your intended policy when you decide upon it. Do not let their conflicting priorities deter you. Their job is to ensure that your objective is seen to completion to the best of their abilities. Do not hesitate, for doing so cedes initiative to the enemy, and the fear of 'potential disaster' will lead to a much more certain disaster in turn.

"I find you to be respectable. Unlike many who are born to power and take such a position for granted, you simply work to do your job to the best of your ability, and you earned your leadership position whether you wished for it or not. You are inexperienced, but leadership is always an on-the-job learning process, and the best leaders have advisors that know their specific fields well enough to make up for any gaps on your part. The burden of leadership is that in the end the final decision lies with you, and making no decision is worse than making the wrong decision. Think on this, and learn." -Cala Vermuth Iron Tiger

OOC PS: I included links to Vermuth and the Cala overview page, as both might be useful reading.

What the hell is this?! Romanic Imperium?! Do I have to judge some Roman emperor now?! Well, lets see who you are. Denigod?! Born to the Roman god of Neptune?! Yeah, I don't buy this. This reads like the typical propaganda of a dictator ruling an uneducated population. Next thing you are going to say that the world ended not because of nuclear war, but because Mars punished the pre-war world or something. Oh, and now you are boasting about your muscles, I'm not even surprised. One good thing that comes from you is that you at least acknowledge some of your flaws like your "dark side." What does that even mean?! You also talk about stubbornness, like how my defense minister is stubborn about wanting to go to war against the Burgundians. Oh, and you also lead from the frontline when wars break out. Please tell me that you are only doing this as a morale-booster and not to actually fight. Now your "fighting skills". Fighting skills does not make a good leader, so this part is mostly irrelevant. Especially considering that you are using swords in a world where guns are available. Do you want to get shot? Well guess that's all I have to say to you, because frankly, there isn't really much to say.

Carl's Mood: Depressed

"I knew it, I just knew it. I had a feeling just by looking at that tragically grey portrait that this would be a depressing story. Why do I torture myself like this? My childhood wasn't sunshine and Barry White on the stereo, but it's nothing compared to Prime Minister Houten's upbringing. A child who should've otherwise experienced the warm and vibrant embrace of a tulip field, who has instead inherited the cold ashes of a scorched earth. It's no way to live...but I guess in an ironic way you can sort of tell a lot about a person by how they perceive their own misfortune. Houten? Well he's the sort of adaptable person who thrives in the ruins around him. Not because he's a sadist, but because he's a leader. A man who equates rubble not with the past, but rather an invaluable construction material for the future. As far as I'm concerned, politicians are politicians, but in such a sorrowful scenario, I wouldn't trust anyone other than Lodewijk."

"They say the erosion of democracy is one of the first things to occur in the face of war, which is why I have so much respect for what this man is trying to achieve. He believes in a future built on the foundation of constitutional law and freedom, a system intended to prevent such a war from ever occurring a second time, and that is a cause that is evidently worth supporting. Theo Theiner might have been the first choice, but if Lodewijk's handle of Champagne-Ardenne is any indication, the people of north-west Europe are in safe hands. I know it's not easy when you're expected to do the work of ten people with just yourself, but like I said, Prime Minister Houten is a leader, and if he can't solve the crisis, I doubt anyone else can."
