I mean, you could explain it with surrogacy, but even then it opens up weakness for the leader's position to be contested. It's generally all-around fucked logically, though.

So... not a cliché, but I just thought I don't see these too often. Trends (or lack of), if you will:

- Mesoamerican or Native American/Native Indian nations. Sure, there are some, but they are not as prominent.
- Nothing based on God of War. I mean... SURE, the game has a lot of stuff that doesn't warrant them being on NS, but not once have I seen a PG-13 Kratos. I suppose making him PG-13 was criminal to how bloodthirsty he was. 🤔
- Last of Us as well. Some franchises just never appear.
- It's extremely rare to see a nation playing as an isolated tribe. And I mean really, really isolated. I am not talking about my nation (Garden at 6th Mile is magical, it doesn't count), but rather isolated human tribes that does not want to be disturbed.
- Not a lot of Halo stuff as well. I think I saw a Covenant nation once, and a Flood-based one, but none of the extended lore and planets. Hmm...

As for clichés, I think this has been said so many times: German, Russian, UK, US, French, the big nations, regardless of timeframe. Now, I am not pointing fingers, don't worry! But it would seem like the very first nations that I see A LOT are Germans and Russians.

Definitely animé leaders.

The Mirjyni-Praseodymian Union

The allied Union between Occidens Praseodymia and Mirjynistan. If you want information on my nation, check out the nations. They mostly go by NS stats. Mirjynistan has more or less the same views as Occidens Praseodymia, but is more traditional and utilitarian, but just as modern and advanced.

Not sure if these are common in F7, but one cliché is putting fictional nations in the modern real world, for example my nation. Not saying it's a bad cliché as long it's done right of course.

For the non-video game "anti-cliches" I can see why someone may not particularly like them

Many people make nations based on what they know, hence why so many nations are based in Europe or America or are European/American cultured as the majority of the site's population comes from the two continents or are familiar with the culture of the regions. In the case of Native Americans, some of the more commonly known Native Americans are either Plains Indians or the natives of Mexico. The former of which are mostly tribal and most users prefer MT+ nations. I'm a bit confused on the latter though, as you'd think a society known for human sacrifice would be loved by the more edgy users of NS. As for Native Indians, India is a fairly meme'd region, so I can see why interest in creating a serious nation based in the region is uncommon.

Isolated tribes suffer from both the whole MT+ issue and the fact that they're... well, isolated. It's not fun for most to just meme around in the middle of a jungle rather than be some major player in regional/global politics.

~~I'm just explaining my point of view because Isolated Tribes, Native Americans, and Native Indians are all topics I have covered with puppets of my own.~~

I feel addressed so hello. Sometimes, the forum flag feels more like an avatar to me and I got bored so I put up pictures from time to time. Sometimes, people have waifu flags. It's a fun, non-serious self-expression in my opinion.

I do have an actual national flag in my factbook, and I will always try to specify when I participate in flag-related threads. But if you have actually seen people who use portraits as IC national flags then... that's unfortunate RIP.

Haha, I am totally guilty of that now and then! Sometimes actual people, most of the time characters from a show, movie, or a game.

But one thing is for certain for me... is that I kept going to this pink and green flag! Nothing screams Valentine Z as much as this flag! ♥

I use ripple just to show that there's no official spec, each TC flag is more or less unique. This one I have right now is just the one hanging up on Smith James from the news thread's house. Green field and white tea leaves with a star arranged in some way is the closest to a spec you'll find.

Also, why is it always cats? You never see like a bull-dude or a wolf girl. Just cats. Cats 24/7.

I've seen a variety of different human-animal hybrids on NS. Plenty of foxgirls. Though the "catgirl" nation's seem to call the most attention to themselves.

That's true, I kind of missed that.

Yeah, I think it's just because that's not part of the expectations one has of the genre, you know? Like there aren't any wolf girls in anime, so if you're trying to fit that style why have them? IDK I guess that's the reasoning behind it but I don't know so. I'm probably horribly wrong in twenty different ways.
