Shame there wasn't another assassin waiting for him to leave the building unguarded. And if he had the time for parties he had time to study more to be a leader instead of seeking short term pleasures. His foreign policy is awful. His nation is so small it could be swept away by any of the major powers and yet he antagonizes them. Look I hate all xenos with a passion and yet I try not to anger all of them at once because I know the Swarm can't handle a coalition that big. Until you are big enough to crush all your rivals at once, you must take care to limit your enemies and use some tact instead of doing what you want. Though I doubt his nation will be around much longer for him to learn these things."

I think that this is a moment that reminds us all of the importance of tolerance, and seeing something from multiple perspectives. Strife for utopia. Nevermind the inevitability of a strong and single-minded leader being the only path for the Volksgemeinschaft, and how it is an affront to the false God of democracy. Every nation to emerge from strife has been fascistic in nature because order is the answer to chaos, and Utopia is the answer for Germany.
