I think it's kinda sad how we mourn over one person so much but shrug when 20,000+ get killed. Like they would mean any less.

So do I, but at least in my case, it's not like I can make myself, or naturally cry over the 20,000 more than the one person (Though, apparently I barely cry when people die period, unless it's well done in a movie...). Just how it works, I guess.

Of course, if you're there, where it happened, having that whole dreary, depressing atmosphere probably just makes it worse when there's that much destruction and death.

Mum-I'm 9 Today.

I'm aging backwards.

True. It'd be ridiculous to cry over 20,000 people you never knew or even cared about until they died. That's also why I don't really understand it why politicians and celebrities are like "My condolences" when random people die. They didn't know them personally, their condolences mean nothing.

Mum-Smell Memory

I wish I was witty like Tyrion Lannister so I could make weird jokes about all the instrumental songs I post and their titles.

Mum-Awake on a Train

These two song titles go well together. Pretty much how riding on a train goes.
