It appears that number of households which possess at least one car is on decline lately. I wonder if it can be attributed to the development and encouragement of public transit systems.

Though they are an incredibly religious nation, with most locals still going to church on a Sunday, they are actually rather progressive. That being said, their ruling party is anything but progressive. Introducing a 5 year conscription period for all citizens, cracking down on freedom of speech, and banning all anarchist, syndicalist, and libertarian parties on charges of treason are all on their agenda. Said party is described as authoritarian, but totalitarian sounds more appropriate.

A majority of the country is located in what would be France in our universe, but most of the people are Italic, with some Celtic and Germanic groups. 35% of the population is estimated to be descended from immigrants since the early 20th century (especially ones that came over after decolonization).

The greatest thing about catching up to the Europeans is that you can learn from their mistakes and corner well enough to beat them in their own race! That's exactly what Hatsunia did while embracing the western values of liberty and enlightenment yet refraining from guns-blazing imperialism which was considered contradicting to these values. That's way more subtle and awesome than digital progress, however highly I adore it!

One major difference between that timeline and OTL is that the British were actually defeated in the American Independence War, rather than losing interest in fighting a war against pissed off colonists; which means Britain basically gave up all of its colonies in North America to the revolutionaries. Which is surprising, given how little interest the people of Canada had at the time to join the US.

The whole point is that I don't believe those are exclusively "western" values.
