I hate them because of epic gamer social problems that stop me from actually understanding people and consequently I don't like making characters out of pure inability to properly create an actual human being with thoughts and feelings. As such I stick with worldbuilding and literally anything else.

I feel like a lot of the most effort-heavy countries are centred around characters, or to make a Prussianism, they're characters with a state, not the other way around. I just make the countries without characters because I am ultra based.

I just find writing characters and their interactions an easier way to stir emotions as I like making people feel things when they read what I've made if that makes sense. Not to mention, including how a character loves their sister very much or is willing to defend their ideals beyond all else is definitely more fun than "the tax rate was decreased by 24%", "the Amazon is still on fire", or whatever other boring day to day governance.

Actually, my first NS nation here 5 years ago (which now belong to the dumpster fire of cringe as it should be) is exactly that, but from the perspective of said ruling elites and their plans for world domination. My current prime NS nation is pretty much a reincarnation of that, only with new actors.

IDK, I come across anti-Catholic stuff here once in a while, so I feel like bringing it up.

i really wish i could expand on my characters more, but my attempts at retconning and refining my lore have left me in a situation where i can't progress any of their backstories without completing at least a skeleton of khoronzon's historical and political development. all my secondary characters depend on evehxhas to move pretty much beyond their preteens, and evehxhas depends both on the state of the khoronzonite political establishment before he took over, which then depends on political history, as well as on all the religious supernatural mumbo jumbo that i have yet to properly update.

of course, none of this excuses the fact that only one of my secondary characters has anything at all written down, but i'll keep telling myself otherwise because it lets me put off coming up with ideas for their early lives.

I suppose there is also a middle ground for that -- to view the world and its situations from the eyes of a character. It is a fun way to explore both character-building and worldbuilding at (relatively) the same time. Because eventually, when we look back at history, we sometimes come to think "why did a certain historical figure choose to do what they did?".

This is why I think making leader/politician characters is interesting. Their personalities, their decisions, and even the thoughts in their heads could affect the lives of their people and even shape up a period in the history of their nations.

I've said it before but I don't really focus too much on my nation's 'characters' because I prefer the worldbuilding aspect of the game. I'm not here to have my Prime Minister or whatever interact with other nation leaders cuz y'all don't exist in my canon, so I just treat my wiki articles about them as exactly that: wiki articles. They're meant to be informative and while they may go into detail on their personality (because that is obviously part of any person, real or fictional), it's not my focus.

(Also I hope no one thinks my nation's current Prime Minister is a self-insert since she's canonically a socialist and I'm a socialist cuz like she's literally the third PM I've had with this nation and her coming to power was like semi-randomized IRL terms)

I like your perspective on this!

Y'all don't exist in WF's canon, either, which is why I circumvent that with the whole "there's a separate canon that's actual an NS portal allowing NS leaders to interact with each other." Problem solved!

I enjoy worldbuilding with characters tbh, and having my nation in multiple shared continuities. Multiple canons is generally a thing most people in the II community do, and character RP can interact a lot with nation and military RP. Just write your character going brrrr on Tu-95, how hard could that be? 🤔

Disclaimer: I have never written a pilot character and Miroslavsky didn't exactly go brrrr in a submarine, unless you count depression.
