They are really, really, bad at making puns

Also, their 3rd leader is sO mYsTeRiOuS no image exists of them. Which makes no sense given how it's an FT Empire and they are in a position of high power. He isn't Banksy or old Jack the Ripper.

They're some strange representation of the Disputed Lands in 1984, except they're an actual, free country. But instead of controlling the African Disputed Zone and the Arabian Disputed Zone, they only control the latter.

By free, I mean not controlled by Eastasia, Eurasia, or Oceania.

Also, yeah, I completely neglected those two. I totally remember them being part of Eastasia.

They inhabit a megastructure constructed by a precursor race, and exist as a loose network of communal nodes rather than any sort of unified nation in the traditional sense. I'm also going to have to agree with Godular on this one - out of all the possible artificial world concepts, the Alderson disc seems pretty damn pointless in its excess.

Actual utility wasn't really taken into consideration at the point of creating this account, but rather a sense of curiosity towards constructing a potential dynamic that might be implied with such a concept.

If I understand correctly, Hatsunia is in the current modern era, and has somehow managed to construct a 1.5km tall skyscraper in their capital city. There has to be some issue with elevators, right?

Anyway, this skyscraper is mainly to alleviate a housing crisis, which makes sense as they seem to have a higher population density than megacities like New York and Tokyo. There are probably more efficient ways to manage that, though, but the badge of a 1.5km tower is probably good for prestige and tourist purposes as well.

The elevator is basically a vertical bullet train.

From an OOC perspective, you gotta do something to make Tokyo look futuristic again.

On my first visit to Tokyo in 2004, when I stood bewildered by the video screens of Shibuya, I wondered to what extent this advertising technology would be ramped up in 10 years' time. How much more extreme could it—would it—get? The answer is none. The Shibuya scramble looks exactly the same today as it did almost a decade ago. The future in Japan has come and gone. It's now in Seoul, whose vertical city planning feels so much more futuristic than the 20th century sprawl of Tokyo, and the new mega-cities of China, which reflect the massive urbanization of our species. It's no surprise that David Mitchell, a 10-year resident of Japan, set his dystopian consumer future of Cloud Atlas not in Tokyo but in Seoul.

What got Guanyu Abramovich y Florante Jr, or better known as Comrade Abra, into his position of Secretary-General of the Pan-Asiatic States, was an extensive campaign through the PAS, with him putting light on his trickle-down diplomacy and anti-corruption agenda. He's frequently described as nationalist.

I've learned that during the Global War, where Inklings were an underdog, managed to succeed and gain an upper hand against mankind due to having reverse-engineered and improved upon captured human machines, and that eventually led to a large-scale deployment of nuclear warheads, and the like.

Shinoda, unlike other politicians of Stanier, has a rather secluded personal life, spending most of her days at an old Imperial Japanese boot camp on the outskirts of Porto Nippōn which had not been seized by Military authorities. Her hobbies still include fencing, karate, and archery. In addition to shooting practices, painting and sculpture.
