Nothing in particular, although "Somewhere Only We Know" by Keane is playing quite clearly and vividly in my head.

I was just thinking of it as referring to how someone close to you can get killed, and you cry a whole lot. But when there's, say, 20,000 people dead in an Earthquake, you might go "Oh my god, that's terrible", but are less likely to cry about it because you have no association to those people. So in a way, they mean nothing to you beyond your possible normal human brief sadness for them.

Man, I take a 1 minute long song title seriously.

I think it's kinda sad how we mourn over one person so much but shrug when 20,000+ get killed. Like they would mean any less.
