Dunno if this really counts as a Cliche, but I suppose just the fact that like a good chunk of people on the forums cannot fathom the idea that both A) Stereotypes Given to Political Followers aren't always true, and B) A nation's concept isn't always the literal perfect utopia according to the player's worldview. I suppose I might just be a little tired considering I play a communal nation, and have seen my fair share of people assuming I hate the United States with a burning passion and think that we need to like murder all political opponents or something. Just the seeming inability to separate writer and their writings.

I don't find Kim Yo Jong particularly attractive to be honest. Sure she's not bad looking, but I wouldn't say she's anything special. So when Reddit was simping for her a few months ago I just didn't get it.

Or plastic surgery and botox injections, which is probably what my leader does.

I mean, you could just have your nation be so ridiculously radical that nobody would ever think a sane person could hold those views. But yeah, most of the time that stuff can be solved with a disclaimer in the signature.

muzhkin turanki really be looking fly doe 🤪🤪

also on the topic of young leaders - i used to just make all my leaders young for no real reason, and now i just jump through hoops of convoluted plot reasons to do the same. thus far i've ended up with a magic soul-eating alien superintelligence, an as-of-yet unannounced ambitious orphan king trying to claim his "rightful" position from an opportunistic regency, and a charismatic revolutionary who's an unwitting puppet of a shadowy mage cabal. as wif pointed out several posts earlier, there's plenty of ways you can elaborate on abnormally young characters in leadership positions that can make for some cool storytelling.
