"This Marut is a parasite in the service of bigger parasites. She feeds on war, on the suffering and destruction that it brings, and has turned such vileness into a career path. I can respect a soldier, who fights for something higher than themselves, but I have no respect for the mercenary, who only fights for their next paycheck. This 'Comerciante' she serves is likewise condemnable, a monument to the voracious greed of private industry and its insatiable hunger, irregardless of what it destroys in the process. Her world was consumed by apocalyptic fire yet continues the self-same processes that produced said apocalypse in the first place. It is only a matter of time before they fall again."

A man that seeks information beyond what is presented by his State's censors to get a comprehensive view of the world around him? If only your counterparts in my world had that dedication to proper, eh, risk assessment and harmonic living. I can certainly say I admire that you're a self-made man, a lot like dear old Great-Grandfather...can't say that about myself. The Second Great War, must've been rough, even if I can't find any comparisons here. The history is too different to do so, Auron-Sirius.

You must know how to maneuver around the world of politics if you can keep enough people satisfied or constrained, and all by the age of 36, you really outdo yourself. Even If I can't say my Government would be too keen on centralized economic planning, at times. Or fish that get too big."

Where is Konstantin Nedelykov, again? The last time he was mentioned or noticed or even cared for by the Kremlin was perhaps last year. He sits in his office in Auestriker Naukograd languishing. His only sins were defeat and unpopular opinions -- or that is what he thinks got him into this position.

He tries to read well into this, but his Braille translation he got is patchy. And God save him... he cannot hear today.

"It has been a while since I am allowed to speak, and even then I only speak for the Grand Prince, in his stead. I am here apparently to address Stanier's Minister of Education. It is an honor, but perhaps an unfortunate time to meet. Perhaps someone thought it would be ironic -- a deafblind man talking to a man in a wheelchair."

"It might be apparent to you that I can neither see nor hear you at the moment, Minister. But I would not dare compare my situation to yours. All situations are unique to each person, even with statistical similarities. I appreciate that you are trying to make the world easier for those who are facing situations similar to ours."

...

"Moreover, I cannot stress more how I respect educators, for I was one myself, as well as the fact that Stanier's position of Ministry of Education is safe in the hands of an experienced educator rather than a tactless bureaucrat. Still, I see that our political games went awry. And again, I will not compare your situation to mine. I will only note that it has been unfortunate... and I am sorry to hear what happened in your home country."

...

"I would wish for your safety and peace under the eyes of God, but it would likely become nonsense to you, so I will only bid a quiet farewell. I ought not to be vocal, only eloquent."

General-President Lutsao Baije: "I find a lot in common with this man, as he and I have both had the unfortunate experience of watching war and destruction from the very battle lines themselves. But strangely, you seemed to go back into it, again and again; your military career never seemed to stop even when you had witnessed tragedy after tragedy. Why is this, friend? What has this world done to your sensibilities? I suppose I could be brash and simply blame it on 'the nobility' as is so common in both our worlds. Or perhaps I could blame it on your mammalian instincts, but then mine aren't any better. Perhaps you believe that by participating in the revolution that you are helping? That by burning down the palaces of your enemies that you can exact revenge for what they took? Maybe you may not acknowledge this, or perhaps you do and you don't say it openly. Trust me when I say this, that no war can be justified by vengeance. I wish that we could speak more about this, I wish someday to be able to help, maybe once my own world has realized its faults as well."

"Conflicts are, in their simplest sense, confrontations over resources or how to allocate resources. The validity of the justifications behind them are varied; everyone certainly believes their cause is the best. Except mercenaries. It is well established that greed is already present in warfare, than even more greed follows in the form of contracts. It becomes a means to live for many, as paradoxical as it may sound at first: killing to live. This is true of the masterless warriors and lower-ranking swordsmen of the Old Empire and also of the hired guns of the far future, despite the sophistication of your armaments. Where was I?

Ah yes. Mercenaries. What can I say...I cannot bring myself to trust people with no ideals or moral guidelines other than making profit. I could hypothetically rely on them to do a job, for a time under stipulated conditions. But that is true of most individuals in varied service sectors, and some of them, I suppose, wouldn't kill me for a price some time afterwards. Without a doubt, you are proficient at whatever you do, Ms. Brittany; but you lack a higher calling that results in loyalty. And quite frankly, I find that repulsive. It cannot be helped, I was raised to value loyalty above all else, it is the purest form of love, transmitted among the Tohorinese for millennia.

Excel at what you must with your men, Sacha Brittany, for success is possibly the only thing you can truly have, apart from wealth, that is. "

Anyway, I'm not to certain on mister scaly over here. In my experience applying military thinking to civilian politics don't usually pan out to well. Now believe me, I've seen plenty of exceptions, and the Commander General seems the sort that might make the distinction that the way you manage soldiers is not the same way you manage your regular civvies.

In the military people are all cogs part of a system demanding obedience, giving away flexibility of control only when the situation demands and harshly stomping on any attempts to make long lasting changes. Civvies are different though, Civvies are cogs, that can choose to simply stop turning pick up and leave and if you try to stop them, well those cogs start picking up wrenches.

Seeing how this general hasn't really got any experience managing any civvies except maybe growing a conscience and I don't know how long his tenure has been so far or what policies he be pressing, I'd simply extend to him the benefit of the doubt. Though he should do a better job next time to read a whole file before commenting on it."

Lutsao blinks a few times and tilts his head back slightly.

"Lady, can you... even see over your own shoulders...? Between the metric ton of steel and holding..." he counts on the ends of his wings "... more than thirteen different administrative jobs, I'd say you're just about the most overworked human I've ever met. Have you considered taking a vacation, perhaps? I'm sure dipping your... mammalian flesh-talons in the waters of Bomkat would be a good experience. After all, I'm sure someone who is as powerhungry and stratocratic as yourself would greatly enjoy mingling with a Vao of a similar feather..."

Supreme General Da Mogshu: "I heard that, waterfowl. I'm sure that this woman is quite lovely. You admonish her for holding so many offices; well, that's just the sign of someone willing to shape their own destiny! She is welcome in my palace any time... so long as her power-armor boots don't scratch the floor."

Leader - Lutsao Handai Bajje

"Avians, i rarely get the opportunity to delve into this sort of race, so this is rather exciting to delve into. From what i can see on Bajje, he seems to be the middle-bird sort of representative, and the main contact for outsiders like myself. seems only fair that i would put my opinion on this one first. Bajje has gone through a fair bit from what i have ready on him, his career started rather fishy and then went into studies, failed once, then jumped back in and succeeded. he has also experienced warfare and understands the negative impact that such would cause regardless of where one falls in it. but the lessons he learned from it helps him with his political career. Overall, Baije is, while not very optimistic, a very stable, level-headed, and respectable individual. It is clear why he is the chosen contact for foreign diplomacy. I feel that I can comfortably seek good relations with Baije and the rest of his people."

Martie Nova Radiant Lapia Starlight: Well, well! Hello there, my friend! Hm hm, yes, Sera! I have heard a lot of great things about you from across the multiverses! Unbounded by time and space, it would seem, that you have experienced a lot more than most people or beings. It's so refreshing to see a benevolent being, what's more someone who is capable of the most amazing feats! I see goodness in you, and so I was wondering if you would like to visit me some time! I have to warn you though, it's a little cold! I know you are not affected by it, but you will still feel it! Alternatively, we can go exploring to other worlds as well. My home is a nexus to a countless number of dimensions, though for obvious reasons, I am the only one who controls such portals, or use them. I do make exceptions now and then, though only temporarily.

"A being of pure energy huh? I guess you probably come from the Otherworld? But while you may not be human I will say this Holly is a very pleasant being around. If she wants to explore the royal gardens and interact with the animals I have in them she is free to do so. I wouldn't mind exploring the garden she made and knowing more of her magic and her state of being."
