Up to 20 years in prison for life-threatening assault against our president, Johnathan Miller. If he dies, though, that's a death penalty.

My nation doesn't have sacred books since we are irreligious. So, no jail time or punishment.

Drunk driving, or being drunk in a public place?

AN did not provide a crime; moving on.

Considered "guilty but mentally ill". For major crimes, this carries only the minimum sentence (murder, as the example, has a minimum of life with possibility for parole) for that crime as stated by law, with most—if not all—that time spent in a high-security mental asylum.

Falsely accusing someone of a crime (such as rape, murder, etc), leading aforementioned someone to serve the full sentence for that crime.

If the accusation was knowingly false, then the sentence is half of whatever the accused crime was. Ex: If somebody accused somebody of a crime and that person went to jail for 4 years, if the accusation turned out to be intentionally false then the accuser would serve 2 years.

If the accusation was unintentionally false, such as a misunderstanding or some mix up, then nothing happens.

6 to 10 years if not used, otherwise up to lifetime.

We've had a national holiday for elections, since ages it is of utmost necessity to grant participation to the poorer stratas.

It depends the level of kidnapping and how many people are abducted. I will say, however, that the for the worst case of kidnapping you will look around 10 years in the mines followed by 1 year prison sentence and 15 years of heavy rehabilitation in our rehabilitation complexes

10 years in prison, but you might be quietly released only a week into your prison sentence if the person you kidnapped was someone the government wanted dead.

Setting a department store on fire.

(Ninja'd, response to the ninja below):

The officer is publicly discharged and barred from working in law enforcement for a few years unless the brutal incident was planned by the government, in which case there's no punishment for it.
