"He's... well. I wouldn't say "boring". Empirically, his life and times appear to have been rather eventful, and the social reforms he has instituted are dynamic, so to termall that as boring would be incorrect froma purely logical standpoint. And yet, he fails to pique my interest. He advocates for the exploration of the stars, but only for the purposes of finding a singular, ultimately inconsequential planet explicitly tied to his nation's past. I see nothing here regarding any sort of broadening of horizons, no furthering of progress. Social modernization is all well and good, but it should form the framework, not the driving force. It is a fulcrum, a step towards a greater purpose - one which this man appears unwilling or unable to further."

I can admire that the method used had created a strong, knowledgeable boy, but surely the boy could be re-integrated into society eventually? He could have made a wonderful heir... and he still can be. It'll just take a lot more time for him to get to know how your system works. "Ahh the grandmaster, a knight in some sense. I must say, the armor you sport is a fine set, though if you ask me it's a bit too shiney perhaps if I were to see it after a battle I'd like it even more, a man with a good sense of fashion.

However, his choice of weapon is less desirable, the rapier is not my preferred too as the three times I've used one I've had it break or nearly break my wrist while I plunged it through armor. Though the dagger, yes he must be quite good with his parry skills.

My final words are about his beliefs. He has done some good deeds, but to say that you do the best and the worst in the name of god is cowardice in my opinion. Man up rather than hide behind the face of those you worship. A Devine call only happens ever so often, I know you arnt that lucky to hear them every decision you make.
