Despite the overall small size of their territory, the difference in length of their long night and day between their northernmost and southernmost points is quite drastic.

That's not correct. The Silda (the main species) were not aware of the fact that the Avarians (the second species) were pre-sapient until like 55 years after unification, at which point the Silda uplifted them.

As for your own post: The ADAF has an active personnel of 3.3 millions and a reserve force of 17.8. That makes them categorically the largest military in their world, and also makes their economy really terrible, because at any given time, around 7% of their entire population is in the military. Who's working if nearly half the work-force is fighting?

The Silurian Empire contains 9 political factions. Archons are appointed by 9 high ranking individuals. One of these factions, the Knights of voids, are "Imperialists to the core." They are focused primarily on expanding the empire. It is quite social-darwin in a sense, since the Empire wants to establish over it's weaker neighbours it's hegemony. They also believe that any species that fight and give them more resources should have better treatment.

Because the USSR was short-lived, the Cold War was a bit less severe; a subtle multipolarity existed instead of an OOC bipolarity, as a loose alliance between three capitalist regional powers (New Transeurasia included) was formed against a socialist China. This multipolarity would re-emerge and solidify for a while in the 1980s through trade wars.

A pseudo-colonisation would continue in New Transeurasia, where instead of the nation being the direct conqueror of her neighbouring lands, these neighbouring developing nations would submit their authorities to New Transeurasia, giving up their political autonomy in exchange for a greater political stability and perhaps a chance at the economic growth the nation has enjoyed (at the exception of Alaska)
