They can be considered the opposite of Tohorinese: they're mostly sedentary and prefer to live in marshy wetlands, save for a handful of cattle-herding families. Furthermore, their social structure is centered around individual nuclear or extended families, and not clans.

AN: Euphrosyne, a great witch and feared specter...has self esteem issues. Most of them are due to people accusing her of being evil and incapable of human emotions, though a fair deal of issues stem from a cold relation with her biological parents.

There was a collapse and technological reversion in 2066, with many areas of the US being led by warlords until the mid-22nd century. Before Wexas formed in the late 24th century, there was the Aggies Duchy (named after an old football team). A new religion formed centered around the marshland, which came into conflict with the Catholic Longhorn Duchy. The Longhorns declared war on the Aggies but lost. The Aggies Duchy, later known as the Duchy of Houston, would expand its territory even further before becoming the Kingdom of Wexas, being all the wetland areas of Texas.

AN: Tohorin is named after a mythological sun goddess. There was another rival deity named Terasu but they hid in a cave instead of battling sea monsters like Tohorin did, according to the myth, and Terasu became the Regent of the Night, envying Tohorin's position.

The relation between mobile and sedentary tribes is one somewhat interdependent. While sedentary city expanses act as safer resting grounds and bases for associated mobile tribes, the more dangerous ventures of mobile tribespeople grant them more sociopolitical influence which is often used to support their sedentary associates.

Synne: Their unique method of "reality bending", using physical extremes to "steal" properties from across Extrapatial channels, is viewed as a continuation of the basic operating principle of the spear, or any sharp weapon - such weapons create a local "extreme" point with the sharp bit and use that to turn the energy behind a strike into something much more lethal, and the creation of greater physical extremes such as singularities does the same thing onto the fabric of "reality" itself, essentially "piercing" through it with concentrated Klepton streams to reach something in another Extrapatial channel.

Gigaverse: The cult of Assarrus is a major enemy of the IOGS, dedicated to worshipping the One God that seeks to push everything in existence into perpetual despair and eliminate all other deities. They spread the former agenda through a mixture of physical and psychological harm on both followers and outsiders, ensuring everyone within their influence has their happiness entirely removed.

Hatsunia is predominantly a temperate country, although the north and south experience more extreme variations in weather and climate. Northern Hatsunia is a more humid, continental climate, akin to Central and Eastern Europe. Meanwhile, the south varies between a Mediterranean climate, with hot summers and mild winters, and a subtropical climate, defined by humid summers and very mild winters with heavy rains. Due to this range of climates, Hatsunia possesses both temperate and broadleaf forests.

AAAN: Leskya communities are small communities of people numbering in the hundreds loosely tied together by an agreement to look out for fellow members though still retaining a sizable amount of individualism with no real morals or formal rules. Some communes are situated in "wider" regions such as towns where members are able to spread out across a territory while others may take up only a few buildings in "taller" urban environments.

AN: Ghesite bows are constructed of a variety of different materials which allow the weapon to retain a relatively small size while possessing an elastic strength similar to that of much larger bows, something key to stabilized fire while on horseback. This makes the bow very expensive in material cost with Ghesite warriors seeing their weapon as their most important possession.
