In the early 16th century, Doreania was divided into four kingdoms (Couloire, Nantes, Lyon, and Montpellier), which had absorbed smaller kingdoms in the past few centuries. After a series of conflicts that hindered economic development, the four kingdoms united in 1527. The "Unionist Movement" also promoted Protestantism.

It's not as surprising if you view the sensibilities of Japanese society through a historical lens. They went from a bonafide feudal society to a modern industrial one in the space of a generation during the Meiji era, with much of the social conventions of the time preserved. That entire process was piecemeal in Europe, with the stripping away of medieval baggage every step of the way.

I initially thought Frisian Freedom was just a made up thing but I'm pleasantly surprised to discover that it's real as a non-feudal realm. Now, Frisia has a problem with floods owing to being a coastal thin-strip nation. They suffer from having their land disappearing to the water due to agricultural activity which also makes farming harder. So since then, they're more of a merchant artisan nation than an agrarian one.

Libya's population is estimated to be 5 million by 1964. The population of the country has grown exponentially due to recent developments in medicine, land irrigation, clean water and others. It presents an interesting demographic makeup; 85% of the people are Arab-speaking Sunni Muslims, yet 90% of them descended from Berbers who were arabized. The most benefitted minority is the German portion of the country that is highly represented in the technological and military fields.

What I found out: Judging from their parliament chart, it seems that the group which is most right wing (economically and/or socially) is either the nationalist or liberal party, which means that the set of parties is kinda basic for a multi-party democracy, and stuff like right-wing libertarianism isn't that popular there.

The country was previously a soviet socialist republic, forming a part of the then USSR following the occupation of its territories by the Nazis. By the 1980s, the country had a powerful independence movement that eventually succeeded in declaring independence in mid-1991.

Prussia -which controls much of the Eastern territories of the Free State of Prussia prior to its dissolution by the Nazis- is currently led by Louis Ferdinand who also happens to be a resistance-fighter, skilled politician and the claimant of the Prussian Throne.

The Frisian Kingdom was conquered by the Franks in 734. Under Carolingian rule, they participated in trading luxuries with other cities in North/West Europe. They were raided by Vikings in the 840s (some of them were peaceful, though). In the 12th century, the Upstalsboom League prevented Frisia from becoming a feudal society.

While it has 750,000 in active personnel, The Royal Doreanian Army only has six regiments. The military's branches in general are weirdly close in personnel number as well, with 600,000 in the Navy and 500,000 in the Air Force (compare it to the OTL French armed forces: Army: 117,000; Navy: 41,160; Air Force: 36,331)

What I found out: Due of the lack of arable farmland, cultivation (and feudalism as well, along with taxation) didn't take as much of a hold in Frisia if compared to other parts of Europe, which meant that they focused on trade a lot more than feudal counterparts (although Frisians do seem to have made a significant profit with their cattle).
