Uhhhhh I think you got the wrong impression of this nation, mate. There ain't nothing Japanese about this nation at all (I mean outside of the name cuz of the inability to change nation names and I don't wanna be one of those 'lol this nation is actually called whatever' types of people and yes I know the letter 'k' isn't that commonly used in French and I could just say that the 'native name' of the nation is Aikoland but that looks wrong to me lmao).

Maybe I'm mentally blending you and Gandoor together (in addition to the animesque profile picture/"flag"). Both nations are controlled by the same user, yes?

I have no problem with it. Zeloria also has almost identical stats to mine, a flag which also has a 4-pointed star, and the exact same founding date as Aguaria Major. I consider him to be a younger, alternate version of myself. Also, a version that is less belligerent, both IC and OOC.

Oui, c'est vrai.

Anyways, speaking of leader pics and whatnot, I recall someone years back in F&NI used a pic of Elizabeth II for their leader and then someone else replied and got mad/annoyed that they were claiming this was their leader when it was obviously Elizabeth II.

Flashbacks to when I first started posting on the forum and I used pics of Lenin, Churchill, and fuckin Reagan for my country's three leaders. Pretty sure I used KGB-era Putin for like a general or something too lmao. Ah to be 14 and thinking 'every job pays EXACTLY the same because communism' makes sense again.

Deadass speaking as someone who is definitely on the left, I don't see the reason to have your ideology be some massive long shit.

Kind of reminds me of the dipshits on Twitter who will go 'hurr durr pronouns in bio' to dismiss someone's argument while their bio says shit like 'I am a post-modern anarcho-capitalist neo-feudalist national conservative alt-right monarchist anti-government libertarian' tbh.

I agree, and have an addendum as to why advertising a very specific ideology is a bad idea: the fact that (and I say this as someone who is unequivocally far-left) people on the left are weirdly obsessed with how ideologically pure everyone is.

You can't claim to be part of any sort of left-wing ideology without a million keyboard warriors jumping down your throat and screaming, "you're not a real x-ist, you're just a  sellout" (that's another weird quality about online leftism that I have noticed - they seem to hate liberals more than anyone else, including, at least to my eyes, the far-right). I had to change my sig ideology from "libertarian democratic communism" to just "leftism" to avoid getting harassed by purist lefties who think I'm not [insert quality] enough to meet any one of the components of that ideology.

For as much as I hate having to say this, conservatives kinda have a point when they talk about leftists being smug and/or elitists.

I'm not sure if conservatives are any less smug about ideology; there are right-winging high towers as well that coin words like "paleoconservatism," "Objectivism," and "minarchism" (not strictly a rightist idea, but often employed on the right) and are willing to insist that no, no, no, those 'conservatives' are all populist sellouts or that no, no, no, those conservatives are all establishment goons.

Me: realizing I could have made Baizouan political parties' names even MORE confusing >:3c

This reminds me of another thing that is arguably a "diche": most nations' political parties I see are defined by their ideologies, rather than by their platforms. My understanding and learning from ideological philosophy about parties was that it can be unwise to ascribe too much ideological meaning to most political parties—they are organizations of people who collaborate to win votes, and sometimes that will require retooling the platform and rebranding the party (e.g. New Deal and Civil Rights era Democrat transformation and Nixon-era Southern Strategy Republicanism).

I guess the desire to defy what I perceived as a "diche" was why I made Baizou's parties platform-based, avoided referencing ideologies except for those I thought would be quite committed to ideology (the Marxists and Socialists), and had some of these platforms contradict their seeming ideologies anyway.

I also think describing parties through their platforms is more accessible. I certainly didn't know what Posadism was when I first saw it in a factbook!

I didn't say they weren't hypocrites - merely that they had a point.

But I think the smugness/elitism is at least more compromising on the left because in a rather perverse display, conservatives seem to be aware of the smugness that permeates their ideology to some degree, even as they decry the "liberal elitist snowflakes". Almost everything they say is some kind of dog whistle, and I think "the virtues of hard, honest work, modesty and humility" have now fallen victim to this phenomenon as well. It doesn't mean what it actually means anymore - it's just code for something too far to the right to say out in the open without being instantly condemned.

On the left, no one ever thinks they're being a jackass because the righteousness of our ideology leads to the fallacy that every action committed in the name of said ideology must also be righteous. I'd argue that's worse than the type of smugness permeating the right.

TBH I do hate liberals, although definitely not as much as I hate the far-right (cause you know, I'm pretty sure libs wouldn't want me dead for being trans, lesbian, and Latina), if only due to my direct interactions with them online.

I've had too many instances of liberals insisting that the entire American left are just 'white dudes', dismissing minority leftists such as myself, using what I call the Schrodinger's leftist argument (the American left is a small minority that basically exists entirely online and can't influence shit, we can just ignore them. But if Democrats lose an election, 'it was because of those damn Bernie Bro leftists refusing to vote!!'), or just outright attacking me for being socialist. (Except for one weirdo on Twitter who accused me of being a Trump supporter because I live in Florida even though my profile literally says I'm a socialist? Yeah it's in Spanish but if you can't figure out what the word 'socialista' means IDK what to tell ya)

That being said, I do have my own problems with the left, outside of purity test bullshit (which luckily I've never encountered), which is mainly surrounding white English-speaking leftists/progressives who feel the need to speak over minority voices or view everything from their own POV. I still think of the time I made a very calm thread on Twitter talking about the term 'Latinx' and why I don't like it, why I view its usage as linguistic imperialism upon the Spanish language, and how I prefer usage of the word 'Latine' as the gender-neutral alternative to Latino/Latina (which lots of my LGBT friends who actually live in Spanish speaking countries use), and some racist imbecile QRT'd me to scream at me about how 'SPANISH IS A SEXIST LANGUAGE' and that 'MY LANGUAGE AND CULTURE ARE SHIT' (because there's only one Hispanophone culture in the world) because of having grammatical gender.

(I also notice how these people only ever target Spanish for being sexist due to grammatical gender, never any other language. I'm sure it has nothing to do with stereotypical depictions of Latin America as being poor and undeveloped countries so clearly everyone who speaks Spanish must be too dumb to understand that they're being sexist at all 😊😊)

Well, we use mostly "it" pronouns, but not because we think having genders is sexist, its because of crazy alien biology.

Honestly, I don't understand why people have to make their positions apparent on every single tiny issue. Just say what you think when the matter presents itself. More importantly why do you need a pro and an anti list when it stands to reason that your antis are whatever opposes your pros?
