Not sure.

There seems to be a federation of sorts going on, where most of the northern hemisphere and (through colonies and puppet states) most of the rest of the world is somehow connected.

It's mostly "Work in Progress".

They seem to be very reminiscent of the Indus River Valley civilization, except exported a few thousand years into the future. An interesting concept, really, especially since it's still PT nonetheless. I'm eager to see where it goes.

The Ghesites like in the Kiu Ghesik Basin, a flat steppe rolling down from the foothills of great mountains in the west and a lake in the east. They usually lived in the western expanses of this basin, though they've been moving east in the last three centuries, to be closer to their client states.

They are a socialist Arab state who really like adding "ish" to the end of every single noun. Their economy isn't very good, but is probably enough to support them.

They raid and pillage on horseback and in a mostly unorganized fashion, focusing on quickly intimidating the enemy whenever possible. Usually, warriors are in small groups or bands, but they can quickly come together (by messengers on horseback) to deal with larger threats. Bows are used for long range attacks, while spears or lances are usually used at closer range.

Ari is only moderately wealthy by Ghesite standards (and poor by anyone else's) mainly because bribing the council to do her bidding is costly business.

Ninja'd

Not only is Hatsunia much less cruel than Imperial Japan was during the inter-war years, the government would make a full apology if anyone in its military committed a war crime (and denialism is punishable by law), which is a bit different from Japan's half-hearted apologies and openly denialist ministers.

A lot of their major weapons are based on cold fusion... which while its use as a power source I can at least suspend my disbelief for, using it as the foundation for a cannon strikes as unbearably silly.

They are allied with most Islamic nations, mostly with Iran but less so with Saudi Arabia, believing that their society needs more reforms and that their royalty lives too extravagantly. Their military is engaged in fighting Islamic extremists/terrorists.

'Macronesian Dollars' must be dirt cheap, since the country's GDP is 155.65
