I mean dystopian nations aren't quite at that degree of extreme brutality, unless they're somewhat unrealistic or unsustainable. Honestly crime in general more arises from poverty, which would be the real source of crime in said dystopian nations (as, hey, what's a dystopia without people clutching at life in the extreme throes of poverty?)

Maybe I used the term "dystopian" incorrectly when I was referring more to authoritarian / totalitarian regimes, where they will surely have some more "problems" than normal crime.

I mean political crime is something to account for and obviously it adds on to a somewhat greater crime rate. I haven't seen anyone who neglects this. That said, the net number of political criminals in states like these only really goes up during periods of intense purging, and usually it actually sits at a rather low number a lot of the time. Of course, there are exceptions to this rule but generally speaking it shouldn't make the crime rate substantially higher.

South Reinkalistan is a massive, ecologically-diverse nation notable for its roving student militias and widespread hatred for the elderly. In the midst of a room-temperature cultural revolution that's lost its momentum, the Party carefully plans its next move. As the brittle bones of fragile empires begin to crack beneath their own weight, history's symphony reaches crescendo pitch. The future is all but certain.

And of course the 'crime rate' only goes up if they actually COUNT those crimes as crimes. Hell, if they even count crimes as crimes in the first place since they'll no doubt want to obscure their crime rate given that they are trying to look good to the international community and present themselves as a utopian system to their citizens. Crime rate isn't exactly a good metric of whether a country is authoritarian or not tbh.

What is a good metric is obviously ideology because what thoughts difference the greatest from my thoughts are obviously totalitarian because it no free think country. /s

Totalitarian and authoritarian are such buzzwords. I can't really take anybody who accuse another nation as being so seriously and even those that do self proclaim to be so is probably doing so with irony.

I mean, not even in the most utopian societies can a crime rate be that low. Unless you have some kind of Big Brother in the house.

The cliché on my end is having to give that country a perfect score.

Now, another cliché that I myself am VERY guilty of is nations that are built around their leader instead of being more standalone and independent.

Tbf character-based nations aren't a bad thing, some people just enjoy char writing over worldbuilding.

I've been having that problem with Tohorin. I was sure I was done...but now...I'm not sure when to immerse the reader in Tohorin's historical events and when to give them a glimpse of her personality or brag about her deeds, which seem a little too much like Phoenix Arcanum's (no offense to Greater Victoria, I'm not just used to the "hero" format). I feel that if I detail their adventures too much, their sense of self gets lost. I'm not too much of a narrator to do it in 1st person form.

You managed to patch up Ari's desires and fears really well with the tribe's inner politics and her courses of action, but they never lose sight of the macro-scale processes around KG or Ari's personal thoughts.

Fair. I've had to push myself to adopt any sort of new format for my characters; breaking out of old habits in writing is hard as hell. If I could presume to give advice about "detailing adventures while preserving sense of self", if you consider how their personal life plays into the choices they make a little bit then that tends to help to get characters to branch out down paths you wouldn't expect.

You managed to patch up Ari's desires and fears really well with the tribe's inner politics and her courses of action, but they never lose sight of the macro-scale processes around KG or Ari's personal thoughts.

That was hard as hell, honestly- I found it easiest to detail when I focused on her interacting within the context of that politics and the society that she lived in. Any other context made it nearly impossible to do.

Ah, who am I kidding, I want Rairai to be a ~~Bushwacker/Jayhawker~~ Wild West gunfighter. Hero is relative.
