Okay soooo...their equivalent of WW1 had more or less the same factions as the ones in OTL, though it ended in a Status-Quo ante bellum and Colonialism never really phased out and if anything, economic crunches of the inter-war years made the Eternal Anglos take even more hardliner stances in colonies like India though also because they took on even more (formerly German) protectorates under their helm. Not that this is exclusive to the Danelaw, colonial flash points of Italy existed around the Middle East and with no USA around, their equivalent of Spain still held onto Cuba well into the 1940s...when the other Colonialism-influenced world war happened.

Sorry if I misinterpreted anything. That's what I understood.

From reading their factbooks, I think I've learned that the Saucer Pilots are, as a society, relatively unambitious. That's not quite the right way to say it, as that makes it sound like they're lazy, which they're not. It's more like they're—modest. They don't crave conquest or expansion. Everyone works hard to be the very best comrade they can be, but one-upping colleagues is in-the-moment sport, not a matter of attaining permanent dominion over others. The Saucer Pilots may well be advanced enough to terraform the earth, and as much as terran living might be more comfortable, the Council (and the people generally it seems) just weren't that interested in it. They're rather have the amusement of humanity than control over the planet. Machinery intentionally deprecates to keep the Anhu employed, and it's created a sort of... again, stasis sounds too negative, because it makes it sound like the Pilots are stuck. I interpret it as being somehow Zen, though in a laidback way and not an ascetic sense. The Saucer Pilots are surprisingly content with what they have. They are livers, not takers; survivors, not breakers.

The Beaudclair-class battleship came as a result of the Commonwealth Navy's Naval Office of Research realized that a supercarrier battleship would be one of the greatest things to be in the hands of the CN, and as a result of this idea the Beaudclair was commissioned, laid down, and launched into service with the CN.

It is an interesting space civilization that is populated primarily by humans and it maintains a interesting combination of military and civilian government (which I could see leading to some problems in the future). And for certain reasons doesn't associate itself with the Interstellar Confederation of Earth. Space faring humans separated from Earth is rare to see in Sci-Fi nations

Zohianian film industry is the oldest in the world, that's where many cinema genres were born, such as comedy, drama and science fiction.

As a small country, Waisnor scores modestly in the Olympic Games, receiving 0-3 medals of any kind since the 1990s. They're better at Eurovision contests when it comes to top scores.

You dun got skipped over UNSPDC, that sucks.

The West and the Communist world more or less teamed up once more to defeat genocidal maniacs, though this time it was aliens and not the moustache man. Consequently, the UN defense forces, known as "Xenonauts", use an array of American and Soviet-derived hardware. Most notably, the space-hugging MiG-32 interceptor that got upgraded with better-quality airframe, engines and weapons systems. MiGs of fire indeed.

I learned that Nova's name might be pronounced differently in the Anhu language. She is called "Nova" because her name appears to literally derive from stellar novas or supernovas. It's sorta like how Japanese and Chinese language(s) names get "translated" into each other—or at least, how I've been told they get translated into each other. Since Japanese and Chinese languages share characters with meanings that sometimes are also shared, I am told that characters are retained while pronunciations are changed to match the target language, as opposed to a transliteration as one might otherwise expect. That way, the name's meaning is retained, although the pronunciation is altered. I don't know if this is still how it's done, but it seems to be what happened to Nova.

Additionally, Nova apparently studied English for fourteen hours a day and thereby became fluent in two months! Dang, I guess biological engineering really did make the Anhu a bit of workaholics.

Baizou has two coalitions in their parliament - ruling Grand Coalition of 1998 and opposing Wakuna Restoration Bloc of 2004.

Also, Grand Coalition has Labor and Lotus Conservative, which is pretty strange to me)
