I just think that's an interesting name for a legislature. Usually, political organizations are called 'Republican', not arms of the government. Paramilitaries sometimes get the term too, like in Iran or Northern Ireland.

Caligolus: The Argustrian Army, arguably the most important unit in the entire armed forces of the Holy Empire, has a personnel number of 48 millions, though only 20 are active.

Thakia: The head of the Promethian Church is called the Bishop of Etyos, also called the Pope. Presumably due to the fact Prometheism is largely designed and influenced by Catholicism, a fact that is recognized even in-universe.

It's not even all of the non-humans in our world, just the most important ones within the Holy Empire. Some, like bugbears, minotaurs, ogres, and orogs weren't worth listing as too few of them are members and there's little worth saying about them beyond "we don't like them." Some, like the many species of giants, aren't listed because they're not citizens, and more just monsters that live in our lands and attack our people. (Obviously, we don't do nothing about this, just our efforts to cull their numbers are not very effective.) So yeah, we just listed notable species who, at a bare minimum, we enslave.

28 million active, actually. And those are approximate numbers. And yeah, a nation with a high population, a solid industrial base, and a decent sized portion of the population having magic bloodlines due to someone in their family tree having slept with some magic creature, combined with a military who drafts everyone with such magic bloodlines... it's going to be a very important military ally, no? And as an important military ally, it is not a bad idea to make them fight our wars for us, wouldn't you agree? Besides, that might get them to invest more in this nice, newfangled "train" technology.

The Test of Potential is the first of the three tests that an aspiring Servant must pass, and involves the prospect landing a blow on an already-trained opponent. While it sounds fairly simple, because the opponent has already learned how to use Servant powers, it's nigh-impossible to hit them without making use of a power. Despite its name, its purpose isn't to determine whether someone has the potential to become a true adherent; instead, it demonstrates that anyone can have it.

While I was hoping that the rest of the world was slightly more sane than the insane cult of Khoronzon, it appears that even the sanest countries are little more than Orwellian states constantly fighting over the world. Even the (most likely) most developed and Democratic lands of Europe and the former US have only basic rights and are much more authoritarian and militaristic than even their modern counterparts.
