Don't care about double post. I've noticed that some nations that do not use NS stats never answered a single issue in their entire NS life. Others have answered issues, but have stopped. There are some exceptions, but those are very rare.

Another cliché is something that I am responsible with. Godmodding in f7 threads. I purposely made my leader so op it can stop entire planets from existing by gazing at it. I'm not alone. I'm definitely not alone. Like NOT alone.

Yes, but have you written enough lore to justify your leader being overpowered? I know I have and am still in the process to add greater justification to it.

I'm trying my best. I go to Forum7 to try to increase my happiness on a bad day, because roleplaying and talking about stuff is fun. Sometimes I get carried away though, which I just did.

I believe you would achieve happiness with roleplaying on this forum is to take the time and comprehend the information of other player's characters, and write a high effort post. So you don't end up being skipped as shown in the Leader's Opinion thread.

i'm not sure if you noticed but people generally don't like you doing that. as in, "that's one of the leading reasons you were dogpiled on n-day" people don't like you doing that. it's annoying to see someone respond to you with substanceless posts consisting of nothing but "teleports behind u" nothing personnel kid" and it saps the fun from everyone else's experience.

Yeah, I find it quite annoying when I put high effort into my post, only to be responded by "Kills you". Many people also put OOC reasons into IC threads. Well yeah, I might create another character to replace Enzo in the event of a dual or a fight.

But then again, Enzo is actually less OP than many of F7 characters.

He uses quantum entanglement and he has very mysterious lore which is something that I like. I am definitely going to nerf Enzo and the Hivemind, so I don't end up beating people left and right, which is extremely hard.

I guess I might even use NS stats again.

Absolute power and omnipotence is damned boring, anyway. Laser pissing on planets is fun for a few minutes and purging entire civilizations is a thing, but running around like a god in a cosmic sandbox gets very aimless very fast. Especially if the premise isn't compelling, or the person at the helm is just a jackass, or if there is nothing to do or be challenged by in the setting. What enjoyment or triumph can be gained from the equivalent of kicking a child's sandcastle over and over and declaring yourself Lord of all Creation and totally-undefeatable-because-I-said-so.

I live and die by NS Stats for myself, and you will have to pry it open from my cold dead handsssss!

With that said, I always look into factbooks first. But I will dunk on your lack of issue-answering, or if I have better stats. C'est la vie, jongen. 🤪

Can confirm. Recently rewrote one of my characters from omnipotence to just "Master of Space and Time". She can and will screw up, even if she has neat powers.

Though with that said, Space and Time manipulation is my wish fulfillment. I always love stuff with time travel and not changing major events, but just screwing around. Though I gotta admit, the Butterfly Effect will hurt.

With Onox, I just have him be limited by being low tech. Like, the guy is a final-boss level on the power scale, but even he would likely be taken out by trather mundane means if he was even in a setting on the tech level of world war 1.

Personally, I don't even bother with F7 character RPs since I know full well it will devolve into a pissing contest to see who can be the most OP after several posts.

Granted I have started to see this pick up in other places with things like "haha uses infinite napalm aircraft to bomb all the things with dead-on accuracy and no resistance, now I own [region]!" in response to a civil war... Despite the DM saying that you can't just invade and take territory and there WILL be difficulties due to the ever-present air defenses (which nobody seemed too bothered to knock out in their entirety, instead using ECM to bypass them or HALO jumps)

That was followed by "infinite napalm airdrops" which basically meant the whole country was now being bathed in liquid fire.

Applies to any kind of RP, actually. Oh no, I am not disagreeing or arguing with you. ^^

From my experience? Always, ALWAYS set your RP rules in stone. Honor systems don't always work, no offense. 🤔

Which leads to another rule / lookout for the DM/OP: Make sure the loopholes are closed!

When in doubt give them flaws. 🤔

I guess I've been preoccupied with this, to the point that I now genuinely despise (and am terrified) at Pasca, or more accurately, his (and the RA in general's) schemes that I've developed in my head but haven't had the chance to write it into reality. Even my currently developing political ideology is under a strong influence of my attempt to counter current phenomena that acquiesces to his directions.

I called them out, all I got in response was a whole wave of crack rp before a mod had to step in and cool things off.

I bailed in response, long before it degraded into a dumpster fire. Not that it was already a dumpster fire, but hey, jumping ship is far better than being tacked with a warning in trying to wrangle several needless arguments.

It's kinda funny, actually... One of the characters I have planned for one of my future nations is...

Well, to put it bluntly, quite black and white... That is to say, he is unredeemably evil and does little other than cause damage, chaos and suffering against the people of the island nation that he and his Pirate Faction raid quite often...

Nevertheless, I believe there is always a possibility for even black and white characters to have a noticeable impact and be something above a gimmick, or an "edge-fest"... My plan for this character is to have him basically be "The devil on the shoulder" of the main character of my nation and story, attempting to coax her into resolving herself to obey instinct over order... So, this black and white character, TL:DR is basically a tool to cause conflict within another character, and help her be more developed, interesting and... Gripping.

It's generally a good rule to make things with nuance, it helps you make things that actually mean anything... There's always exceptions to a rule though.

Personally, character wise, I used to like to strike a balance between unimportant characters and important characters but now I personally like writing ordinary people more than I do the most well-known people in the nation. Or, if they are well known, I like to write them as somewhat humble and down-to-earth people, and considering the history of Macronesia, that's probably a true characterization. Readers can empathize more with ordinary people than presidents, dictators, and royalty, and so they are better liked. Furthermore, when all you do is write about the most important people in your nation, you don't get a full view of what the nation is like. For example, if you solely read Ross's factbook, you may get the impression that he's not entirely a terrible guy, but if you read through the history, other characters' files, and the CNIF history, you may come to a different conclusion. If I'd settled for just writing Ross's factbook, none of those outside views would even exist, and people's impression of him would be much different. The same idea applies to other leaders I see. When they're portrayed solely from a point of view that chooses to make them look like they're in the right, I feel the need to question what they did wrong. And believe me, everybody's done something wrong, influential individuals moreso.
