The problem with morality is that different cultures have different ideas on what is, and is not moral. Opposing immorality can mean anything depending on the culture.

Is it a cliché that, perhaps most of the time, characters who happen to be scientific geniuses just happen to have all the answers to every problem?

"NOT scientifically possible!"

Seriously though, yeah I'll need to write that for some of my more scientific characters. Maybe the flaws they have, the obstacles that they have to go through, not just "Invent this, invent that, no sweat!"

Thanks for the inspiration! ♥◻

Yes yes yes a thousand times yes.

Not just in NS, but everywhere.

Yeah, I mean, scientists don't just look at every problem and say, 'Yeah we can totally fix that' but rather, 'We can fix that, but how exactly?'. I like characters who are scientists but not the ones who just happen to possess all-knowing knowledge like a cure for all cancers, disease, aging, my sleeping hours etc. IMO it's going to get boring when there is this one science-leader is written the same way as the other science-leader-character-person.

Not just in NS, but everywhere.

I don't even care if their personalities are summed up in the words like "eccentric", "mad geniuses", "super duper smart" whatever. Also, I don't even care if they're evil or good scientists, just make me care about them.

I'm gonna start memeing about the fact that my ears went AAAAAAAAAHHHHH on me and how doctor visits are making me less capitalist, until this meme becomes a cliché.

Just kidding, on another note, what even is the point of most of NS's royal marriages? I'm sicker sure (Redundancy: 100) they are mostly diplomatic in their intent.

It will be funny when the reason its in II is because the divorce starts a war. Not any war, but the typical one-liner war powerwanker wars.
