Technically not a crime. Frowned upon and could lead to other charges if it provably causes death, but technically legal otherwise.

Leaving your dog unrestrained in public, leading to it attacking members of the public?

Dog will be seized and the owner could potentially be facing punishment ranging from jailtime to heavy fines depending on the injuries of those attacked.

Since AN didn't leave a crime, I'll answer Tangatarehua by saying that the dog would be seized and trained, turned into a member of either a K-9 unit or used to detect mines

The instillation of stolen aftermarket power/speed mods into your personal vehicle (the perpetrator doesn't know they're stolen, however)

No punishment for the owner of the vehicle they're installed on, but whoever did the stealing has to repay for all the stolen parts and damages plus a hefty fine to whoever he stole from.

No such crime recognised, but you could get fines or jail time for the following:

- Financing a criminal syndicate
- Financing an enemy of Juansonia
- Conspiracy to (whatever terrorist attacks can be traced to the funds)
- Treason

A fine equivalent to the cost needed to repair or replace the drone. If the person cannot pay this price, they will be sentenced for a week of forced, unpaid labor under the package delivery company owning the drone.

"It is not a crime according to approximately 43% of the total Member States of the Confederacy, in 28% of the total member states its a minor offense that will engender a minor fine... in 8% of the member states you may be expected to show up for a court case to provide evidence you do not deserve jail time for it, in 7% of the member states it's immediate jail time up to a few months, in 6% of member states you are looking at an even year of state jail time, in 5% of member states you are looking at several years of state jail time.

In 3% of member states its an immediate death penalty..."

Punishment is often decided based on circumstance, most notably whether or not the victim(s) of your theft want to press charges, but you would likely get a fine or short, non-jail punishment for having stolen.

Walking up to an on-duty police officer that is standing outside a restaurant and proceeding to curse and scream at them, without creating a physical threat.

Bearing arms? As in the right listed in the 2nd Amendment of the United States Constitution? Not a crime. Actually, it's a rather respected move in the eyes of society and government. Just don't commit any crimes and you get no jail time

Edit: If you are arming bears, that's honestly super cool, and whilst it wouldn't result in any charges in and of itself, the military might approach you to learn your secrets.

The offender and their children are executed with a machinegun. An evaluation is done on the offspring of their family members, and if they are at risk, they are either sterilized or executed. It depends.
