The Caleshan Valkyrie wrote:

While Hatsunia is based on Japan, there is a major difference between the two in terms of overall outlook. Japan is stated as advancing progressive policies in such a way that they still retain a connection to the traditions of the past, while Hatsunia has functionally gone into full-throated progressive overdrive. I'm not exactly clear on how this relates to certain stylistic choices, but I get the impression that they approach the idea of advancing knowledge and technology with an almost fanatical zeal...

I HOPE I read that section right...

To clarify, some traditions still exist in Hatsunia (it's not like the "Cultural Revolution" or "Year Zero"), but if a traditional practice is found to reduce efficiency or quality of life, it is replaced with something better.

They beat an army backed by the US, Vietnam-style.

The military of Hamatu was originally a small group of religious warriors called the Turru Tuktê, but it grew over the centuries, eventually accepting many people outside the order after the Industrial Revolution.

Land warfare strategy originally involved direct charges into the enemy (but that has recently declined due to it becoming more suicidal), while aquatic warfare involves stealth and sabotage against (the ships of) terrestrial enemies, and chemical/biowarfare against other aquatic enemies.

If Japan wasn't conquered and had a massive progressive attitude and you basically end up where they are at. They fully embrace technology and have a no holds bar attitude when it comes to advancement. But they still maintain a civil demeanor unlike other science based nations that lose all human feeling

They appear to have taken IC advantage of a report from the BBC in which groundwater supplies were found to be rather impressive in terms of purported output. They say they are already extracting the water in 'environmentally sensitive ways', but I'm noting that a significant chunk of the best groundwater output happens to be in square inside the African Rainforest belt. I'm not entirely certain that swiping the water from there would be... advisable.

Still, there's plenty under the Sahara, apparently.

The country has implemented a series of literal anti-white male laws, such as a ban on land ownership, disenfranchisement, and a national curfew on all white men. Despite this, the country insists they're equal with the rest of the African population.

Guess the alt-right was right all along.

AN: the vast majority of Caleshan weaponry consists of railguns, which are present on most vehicles as well as mounted on their versions of the power armour.

Agricultural communes are pushed to produce at least 2000 calories a day for each resident; those that fail to meet this cutoff are regarded as exploitable and may be either given community aid or blacklisted, depending on the reason for their underproduction.

In the Ghesite faith, Winds are seen as separate entities operating under the Sky-Mother as a sort of bridging medium between the world as humans know it and her own less material plane of existence. For example, the cardinal winds as these beings are characterized by what material effects are associated with their coming/direction, e.g. the North Wind is seen as a herald of wealth due to Ghesite relations with Northern trading groups, and the East Wind is seen as loving as sea storms from the East bring fertility to the land.

Much like the meaning behind the name of the Sahara or what the Apache Indians call themselves and not their exonym, the homeland that the mythological ancestor (Ghes) of the nomad clans moved into was given a descriptive name... "Basin".

AN: By the 2700s, the use of a type of light "liner craft" and re-accommodated shipping and passenger routes had led to the obsolescence of solar sailing vessels traversing deep space.

Both of these are due to its unique biosphere, which consists entirely of single-celled organisms with a variety of exotic features that make them extremely dangerous to multicellular life.

They consider a creature's mind as two separate parts, a 'Nous' which is roughly comparable to the concept of a soul, and a Phylax which is a blanket term for the physical mechanism that facilitates cognition. This phylax thingie can be in the form of an organic brain or most any form of computer processor. While the Nous and the Phylax are naturally intertwined with each other, the connection between the two can be unraveled and the nous removed. For creatures that previously possessed a nous, this confers benefits for some reason.

The FT Caleshan are so advanced they've essentially made time their bitch; as a result they don't need any weapons beyond spears. After all they can literally hurl spears at appreciable fractions of C. I imagine that they would see the Godulans' most advanced shit as peashooters to be used when one needs to be subtle.

everything's a work in progress for now, but looking at the format, the secure nature of the intranet and everything in between, I may judge (correct me if I'm wrong) the AN to be a secretive military (perhaps naval?) hierarchy which, one can assume, relies heavily on FT tech to communicate.

Their AU has recently experienced troubles surrounding the Memel province, with German nationalists terrorising the residents in order to push the province under German control. Lithuania has managed to maintain control over the region so far, however, their East German equivalent did not recognise the move; a war has now broken out between the two countries over this issue.
