Gravedigging is the dumbest shit tbh.

Like I can kinda get someone gravedigging a thread that's six or seven months old, but when you get to gravedigging threads that are literal years old is where I go 'Do you people not have reading comprehension and can see that the thread was last posted in 2013?'

NGL I've once or twice accidentally gravedigged before I found out about "view your posts". Luckily I was clever enough to delete all of such instances before the mods got involved so no rules broken here I suppose

Honestly, nobody actually gets in trouble for gravedigging in 99.9% of cases. Really the only time you'll actually see a mod warn (or potentially even temp-ban) a user for gravedigging is if they constantly do it and continue to do it even after being told by the mods to knock it off. (And I guess there are also the very rare instances of someone deliberately making a spammy gravedig, like digging up a thread from like 2010 and going 'WOW OMG THIS THREAD IS SO OLD!!!' but I think I've only seen that like two or three times in my NS career)

When I checked "Who is Online", it is indeed strange to see some people checking out very old threads. I thought it was something new and fresh, then BAM, OP was from 2011, CTed for goodness-knows-how-long, etc.

Other times, it's just bots and spiders that are trawling for technical purposes.

Describing an alt-WW2 in the LP-verse that kills +200 million people has been harder to stomach than I anticipated, after I got to the human details and not the impersonal statistics. Oh, and I can't get the Brit No. 5 Uniform right. So I don't want to draw characters. Bummer.

I also tried writing a more "upbeat" war (an oxymoron if ever there was one) with interdimensional time travel based on the awful ending of a decent alt-history show...but it left me too puzzled to continue as I'm stumped over what happens after "Mission Accomplished."

TL;DR...I wrote fanfiction and may make it a nation. That's probably a cliché.

An early version of Lavinia-controlled Laka is like this. A nation locked in a constant struggle with colonial rebels due to a need for an enormous amount of resources, essentially resorting to extreme measures (converting humans into fighting machines because Station 12).

Also First Minister designs always end up being either too crappy or too harsh... Like PG-13 exists for a reason and writing and especially drawing a character that is essentially a paralyzed living corpse (basically Hawking's condition but MUCH WORSE) maintained in a near-death condition by life support machines is not exactly a fun experience

Is that the one with the big prologue involving total environmental collapse or is that M22? Oh wait, it is. I remember reading that after doomscrolling once.

My drafts over the "bad route" of LP's timeline hit like that early on.

I'm totally stumped because the content is that potentially insensitive. I don't know what could be more awkward: Italy captures Malta early on in 1940, the DAK gets x3 the supplies, yadda yadda. Then what? The Nazis invade Iraq through Palestine and it conveniently fades to black? Or do I detail the inevitable...AND that's the start of the timeline.

don't be afraid to write the darkness, it's rather impossible to evade; that being said, i tend to find that it's best not to linger. if one presents it in a stark, cold, unloving light, bluntly presenting the reader with the dark facts, while not focusing on those atrocities, it often becomes tragic or terrifying in its enormity rather than coming across as glorifying the atrocity or reveling in its darkness or for lack of a better world edginess. however you may need to fade to black because... yknow... nazis.

Noooooooo... Not at aaaalllll! I totally am incapable of coming up with any bleak stories! Look at me, typing from a "nation" whose background lore is completely wholesome with no deaths, and whose characters are completely functional and very satisfied well-written human beings!

In all seriousness though, all of my projects eventually end up like that, even if their premise is supposed to be relatively wholesome-ish (or at the very least, not completely bleak). Like, all I'm gonna say is that the original premise for this one was merely just "canon faction but without the bullshit tech". Then institutional paranoia came up, probably because my brain was like "an organization like Foehn would probably be very wary of brainwashed people". Then... you can probably figure out the rest. And the plans for the future are not any better.

I'll be honest, I always have a lingering feeling of the stuff I'm writing for FPR being needlessly edgy... even though it might be completely unjustified? I dunno, I just dunno...

The little writing exercise has been so intense that I wound up feeling bad for the Nazis too at the end, too. I got a bit humbled over what even 200-300 cans of 1st Generation Instant Sunshine could do. I really did get into the role of an early-1950s General who genuinely thinks that nukes are clean a bit too much.

All around, I think I get why CBG and M22 have been slow developments now. It's convenient to start a post-apocalyptic story after the Apocalypse. It's not so nice to describe it.

Writing about the Man in High Castle Nazis and Japanese getting Desert Storm'd by 'Murican demons (don't ask why, I don't know either) has been very wholesome feelsgoodman, tho.

If I am misunderstanding the question, forgive me, but anyways. I try not to make "sad nations" because I am sure that if I made a nation that's only doom and gloom, it would turn out looking like a 12-year-old's "X the Killer" Creepypasta/Sonic OC.

However, I have frequently written things for nations that make me lean back and go "what the fuck am I doing?" Not in a "ew, this is cringe/bad" kind of way. In a "why am I doing this to these poor people?" kind of way - if that makes any sense. Examples include: Topoliani (Both Pre and Post Retcon), Yoooper High Kingdom, This nation, Alliance of Self-Defensive Territories, Texian Communes, The Near Islands, Bunarvish and the worst offender - Wexas.

Admittedly a lot of the 'what the fuck' moments I have had with those nations is content that is unreleased, head canon, or stuff I retconned. And even then, I feel like my nations are a lot "tamer" than other nations. Not in a worldbuilding sense, but in a "bleak/sad" sense. So I feel kinda silly when I look at some of the stuff that I rejected and compare it to other people's works. But eh, I guess everyone has different tolerances.
