Tbh, aside from the portraits, it's a common trope to have leaders that are well rounded without any flaws, or with as few flaws as possible, while fully embracing whatever political system said country has.

There's only a few where the leader is deranged and damaged in some way, even harboring some resentment or resistance to the current state of affairs, seeking to change it slowly to better suit their own ideals. Ergo, a mentally scarred Maoist who is placed into the office of a democratic monarchy with a bipartisan majority party in a multi-party system.

A traumatized, but recovering, MT-PMT constitutional monarchy consisting of a personal union of Prussia and Poland. A land of rampant gun ownership, governmental schizophrenia, militias with enough heavy weapons to turn an armored division into a badly-shaken battalion of light infantry, and terrified USAF personnel counting down the days until they rotate back home.

Weaponization rate(14 weapons per person) and crime rate(1.77 crimes per hour) both canon. Cry about it.

I'm going off the F7 threads, not international incidents here. Somehow F7 seems to cover a broad range of nations, beyond the cookie-cutter democracies.

The first two aren't world leaders, the last two are constitutional monarchs who don't hold power, the second to last being a queen who married into her position, so not really a world leader either. Macron, Arden, and Trudeau could definitely be considered attractive, but they're all generally "older" and far from the straight up supermodels used here. The prime minister of Finland is an exception.

I mean I'm lesbian but I'd still rate Trudeau as like average in terms of appearance?

Which is honestly the big takeaway here: actual 'ugly' people aren't that common, the vast majority of people are going to be of average or above average appearance.

Well, it's the matter of truth that attractive or complete abominations are the most interesting type to see.

Either it's nice to look at or so hideous that it's fascinating, this is how designed characters usually go, an age old rule in character designers in online games.

For the latter, it's just most players who are left or right and value democracy are ideologically trapped in having their elected leader align with their views, and not really ever have a new leader that is the opposite of them.

The vast majority of people on this site are either Americans, Canadians, or British and what electoral system do those countries use?

Exactly.

People tend to go by what they know when it comes to creating their nations.

Americans aren't even aware of the electoral system or how craptastic it has become as of late, especially with the media's predictions somehow being the complete opposite of the expected result should they attempt to guess at who will win long before voting even starts.

Also due to this it's pretty much simplified to all hell as well.

I gave up on realism. Not that one can be "realistic" with mythological creatures given a new lease on life in pop-culture, nor am I high-brow to make it true to Medieval tradition.

That says a lot more about you than me, my dude or dudette.

The "hero", if I don't decide on a good-looking James Bond ripoff prettyboy doodle I have, is basically Jean Reno when he plays a Medieval knight, in hindsight. So now I feel less bad about being able to make things other than booba:

Honestly, I feel like a general rule of thumb should be 'diches aren't bad, just how you use them is.'

But that would mean putting in effort rather than just saying "all nations that have militaries more powerful than mine are boring military-wanks. (Which is every MT+ nation and most PT nations)" And honestly, that's easier.

I don't use appearances as a crutch for leader characters - namely, my heads of state and government both are old white men - but their fashion/drip and pure, radiant, concentrated sigma energy is what ensnares their populations to a form of in-character respect.

Namely because a leader that is bland in fashion, physical appearance, and personality comes off as that - bland and forgettable.

Well, I do think we could use some characters from the other side of the spectrum, so ugly that they are an offense to the eyes and that it's hilarious. Noone wants to look at a character that looks boring, imo. Either nice to look at or so hideous that it's funny.

Although for the latter one would require either their own art, use certain genres or use an MMO character designer.
