It most likely won't work due to the police (and the public here) not actually having a concept of hostages. To them, killing a civilian while on duty is nothing unusual- and the same is true for the civilians most of whom wouldn't care less if they were to die in a heist. The reason for this is that contrary to other cultures, almost all Lakans view themselves as expendable- so the bank security, visitors and even clerks will be extremely hard to take hostage. Police won't even care about them, after all. If they somehow manage to pull this off then it's a death penalty through forced labor, what would you expect?

Egregious abuse of authority and unnecessary use of violence by law enforcement tend to land those officers into long-term protective custody.

Not a crime, but if it can be deemed to be harassment, the cyberbully (ies) in question have their social media revoked for 2 months and IP address banned from any site or service they were using to harass others. Has to meet a high standard for "harassment", however.

You will be forced to pay all of the lost money as soon as possible, with an additional set fine for each time you committed that crime. If you can't pay enough of that money quickly enough, you'll go to jail while all your pay is confiscated and be released when all the money is collected. Also, that would be a stupid idea anyway because you could've just applied to the National Health and Welfare Society and gotten most of the money you made anyway, and would've been able to keep it without constantly hiding from the government. But, you know, people will do that.

She will personally hunt down whoever did this and try to challenge said person to a duel. From a point of law it depends on whether it is a dueling challenge (deadly duels are legal and happen from time to time here and there) or just generic death threats which are punishable by heavy fines and up to a year in prison

War crimes? To be more precise- accidentally killing civilians in a drone (or air) strike
