CSS used to do that sort of thing. Like randomly in a war RP have the soldiers go visit a brothel, then RP the girls flirting and all... bleh.

This is partially why many of my characters, particularly royals, are either married or engaged. I don't want to deal with creepy homyposters, specifically the type that spans royal marriage TGs and such.

Um... thank god I haven't had to deal with that. Which... given that my most notable character is literally a young single woman with ownership of a number of sharp objects, an aversion to most forms of physical contact, low key manic depression, and according to several sources fucking creepy face paint is a bit of a surprise. Very much one that I'm thankful for, that's just... creepy... but still, you'd think at least someone would be homi enough.

How often does it happen?

I did military and diplomacy RPs a long time ago, usually with just one or two more people, so the horny was at a minimum even if we used animu characters.

If you ever even thought of having a female character way back in the day, you'd become a target. Male Characters were safer, but they better have been at least 50 years old or otherwise disgusting if you wanted to be totally safe. It's still around. It will always be around. HorNsy shall always be. The best you can do is try to avoid the overtly horny, but even then, some are more insidious and sneaky than others...

Jokes aside, yeah. It's more of a common occurrence around the 'bad MT nation' crowd (I.E "X-Nation but my ideas are in power!" or "Constitutional Monarchy with a ruling family that only exists to be pretty!"), but it can happen to anyone. Usually, it's just annoying, but sometimes man - sometimes it just borders on sad and creepy.

I have planned out or written a couple romance subplots in the past. There are definite advantages to planning it out and to discussing whether or not the characters in question have the chemistry and the dialogue to make a believable and compelling relationship. I think romance is a useful tool in a story-teller or role-player's kit since it adds verisimilitude to a story and world, creates a lot of pathos, and interweaves the political and the personal adeptly when done right. Of course, there are also people who are just being horny on main. Here are a couple excerpts from romances I planned ahead of time. One ended badly (IC), the other never made it into canon.

He had chosen Sophia. After months of furtive kisses and stolen glances, after galas and secret picnics in the woods, after the media buzz and the disapproving whispers he claimed not to care about, after the sweet words and assurances exchanged as they embraced, Nathan had chosen Sophia. Arietta and Selene had warned her a dozen times. Her own fears had trumpeted at her to keep her distance and to ignore her cheeks blushing red as apples when he looked at her a bit too long or muttered some idle praise to her. All of the promises had been laid bare, and now every one of them felt like an iron pin lodged through her chest - as though she were a butterfly wriggling on a macabre spreading board. It was always going to be her. It was always going to be Sophia. That's how the story was supposed to end. But then why did it hurt so bad?

And, really, what had Sophia had in the end that had eluded her? Did they not have the same dusky hair, the same pale complexion? Sophia was meeker perhaps, more noble in her manners and upbringing. She didn't have calluses on her hands or soot clinging to her cheeks where blush ought to have been. She didn't wear the same melancholic expression when she peered down from a broad cliff that hung over the verdant, jostling waves. Perhaps Sophia was just easier for a man like Nate to love. She had no desolate hall across the sea to dream about each night. She had more discipline in her words and in her gestures. Her embraces were less fierce, less fearful. Her kisses came softer and lacked the sylvan desperation of a girl who had lost too much too soon. Sophia was of Ghant and knew its snowfalls and its liquid language and its peculiar customs. And she was beautiful, like the mirage of an oasis. A man would always come back to her.

Soraya could see all that, even through the mist of bitter tears, and she wept all the more bitterly for it, and for what she had lost.

This is the one that sadly never made it into canon. Kanan is blind, largely because I wanted to experiment with relying on senses aside from sight with a character and with themes of independence in spite of her physical handicap. Honestly, it was very wholesome.

"If the gods granted me just one prayer, I... I would want to see your face before I died. I don't think I'd have any regrets after that."

"Of all the things, Kanan... you wouldn't want to see the stars you're always babbling about? Or the sunset over the ocean?"

"I've read about those in books already. And... if I saw you... I wouldn't need any of those. I'd have already glanced upon the most beautiful thing in the whole wide world."

"You don't know I'm beautiful."

"I know it in my soul. It's why my heart flutters when you kiss me and why my stomach twists into knots when I think about you and why, when I'm with you, all my troubles fall away."

I've yet to be victim to the homyposters despite my nation having a female leader. But she's also 51 years old and married with two adult children so maybe that keeps the homyposters away. Or more likely since I don't RP much due to most RP on NS being bad they're just simply unaware.

Yeah, I can agree. It's alright if it's to advance a plot. And sometimes it's adorable even, though I have only seen a handful of examples of characters from other nations coming together in an actually kinda sweet example.

Unfortunately, most of the time, it's horny. Or horny under the thin veneer of worldbuilding. At least take it to discord DMs or something, you fricks.
