Another cliché to note is all those nations that use "Reich" in their name even

Think I might share an idea, albeit I'll keep it brief, here.

I've been obsessed recently with Christian Anarchism, it's philosophy, and how it could work in my lore. Lore wise, I have a nation in Siberia that does follow the ideology, but I kinda want to expand it. I'm thinking of, for no reason, bringing it to Vojvodina. It'll basically be a nation founded in late 1917, before WW1 had ended, from a revolt against the Austro-Hungarians. The revolt is led by some members of the Karadordević dynasty of Serbia, and by a child of Leo Tolstoy. Did it last? For all the way until Yugoslav unification, which in our universe didn't occur until 1928, yes. How will I do it? Don't know.

I can feel the salt from here.

Maybe just tone it down a little? This isn't a place for ranting aimlessly.

... Though I also wonder why people still make threads that read more like rants against certain things like set political ideals or certain rulers or even specific laws... Or literally anything else.

Not really. I feel like I would get bored with a nation that follows my political views unless I added something else to it - like "what happens if my political ideology turns out to suck?", "what happens when internal or external pressures threaten my ideology or the nation it exists in?", etc.

A cliché in regards to the armed forces of a small, fictional country in a contemporary setting: millions, even tens of millions, of soldiers serving in a military of a small country. A small country. Usually a military of a small country like the ones seen in Europe has something between tens of thousands to hundreds of thousands. I don't know what you all are thinking but I'm going to act like what you're all exactly thinking: "but dude, didn't a few European countries have armies of a million soldiers before?". Yeah, but I'm talking about armies of small countries in a contemporary setting, not the 1900s.

There's another thing - in modern war, bigger /= better.

If your nation is a small, MT, and western country - HOI4-esc tactics such as "throw more conscripts at the pillbox" are kinda counter-intuitive when said nation likely has guided artillery, bomber aircraft, and drones - or is allied with nations that do. Especially in an era of intense media scrutinization where a single soldier dying in battle can spark headlines. But unless your nation has a near-infinite budget, you can't have both a large and high-quality military. If Sweden, for example, were to conscript 2 million soldiers and give them all US-tier equipment (because non-combat roles don't exist on NS), they would be spending 35 billion on infantry alone - or about 5.6 times its military budget in 2020. There'd definitely be no room left in the budget for Gripen.

Also, that FT or PMT nations still use ground movement is rather weird. One would think that automatizing the entire army or having a even larger innovation of how war is fought would happen.
