Although the label of competitive RP could certainly be applied to a certain genre of RP(I remember, a few years back, that P2TM had a subgenre of thread that WAS basically a text-based strategy game), the overall goal of most quality NSers is to tell a story. Even if said story is told through war. Do you want to know why? Because in an RP where all players are in there only to ""win"", it very quickly deteriorates into a godmodding fustercluck. And I know this because I've been around the block on Nationstates RP, be it RMB, P2TM, or II. The metahuman roleplays I used to participate in told the story of people of great power needing to cope with a world that wanted them exploited for its own ends or exterminated. The old regional roleplays told the evolving history of entire communities, and on II, even if I was participating in a conflict, it was to the backdrop of an overarching master plan or plot arc that would reach its conclusion at the end of the roleplay.

People who view NSRP as a "competitive" scene really need to rethink their mindset, and, in the words of a certain prussian-polish user, go touch grass.

People who competitively RP are the most likely to already be 'touching grass', so to speak, which is actually not 'in the words of' a certain Prussian-Polish user at all.

it is worth noting re. your nation and some of the others in this thread that responded to that point of mine that i never got around to was that i was more making a comment on how inexplicably aliens will have generals and presidents and republics in the classical style and roman-style legions and other very much obviously taken-from-earth social structures that were scraped by the author without regard for their sociohistorical shaping factors. the romans, for instance, would've never developed the legion structure without a need to fight phalanxes of opponents, and most conceptions of a modern-day republic come from either classical ideas or the enlightenment notion of human rights and representation, which were of course heavily influenced by their knowledge of classical ideas. when they pop up isolated on another planet with no explanation given for their emergence it can for me at least be jarring.

Why do you even think NSRP is competitive, even though there are plenty of genres within it that cannot be summed as such?

How do you "win" in an RP? In the end someone has to lose, and 9/10 times in such "competitive" RPs, due to there being no actual constraints or rules, turns into a wankfest pulling random things out

1. No, it's about winning, not "winning anyway". The anyway has nothing to do with the winning.
2. I am constantly looking at new innovations to make even the most innocuous student RP competitive.
3. That has nothing to do with anything.

Long posts are a weakness in competitive RP. I pulled several all-nighters many years ago writing one-liners in a rapid-paced P2TM RP that was eventually locked by a moderator for spam. While I am sure the writers you have linked to have their merits, they are writers who are not really in the tradition of NationStates roleplay if you get what I am saying.

I'll give it that, there IS recently a thread that uses NS stats and it's quite unique. It's no different from the ones that you need to judge based on a flag.

If I see a Factbook, I'll use that. If there's none, then yeah, stats it is.

What is this "tradition" the only tradition that is widely popular is high-effort, creative, original, and impassioned roleplays. Most players come here for that, and not to pollute the forums with "haha I nuke your country with over 9000 nukes." You've been here long enough to have realized since joining into nation-states for the very first time such as I. That writing gloriously long posts is the standard for all those who want to tell a story to enjoy and share amongst their communities.
