See I have a puppet that's literally based on a long-running kid's anime franchise and how the fuck am I supposed to actually write lore for that beyond 'Yeah if you wanna know more about these characters literally go and watch all 842 (soon to be 843) episodes of this franchise that's been airing since 2004 and is much more popular than a lot of Western weebies think?

Well the easiest way would be to summarize each of the characters in general and list practically interesting stuff about them, but you also run the risk of sounding like a wiki article. If that isn't juicy enough for you, you could turn it into your fan fic with predicting what the characters will do based on your knowledge of them. My main, the Zravvisk, is technically a fanfic nation of Metroid, but since I've put so much effort into it, I'm not even sure anyone knew it was based on Metroid unless they looked into one of two factbooks that made it obvious.

Yeah I mean I could that but there are also like 68 (soon to be 69) main characters in this franchise so that probably would end up sounding like a wiki article about the characters lmao.

As someone who has 86 characters across his nations (62 from Val Z, the rest are from... various others), do it, just do it! 😊

i did it b/c i plan to give these guys all at least short overviews not every state obvs

but just the relevant ones

way i see it, there's no point making twenty puppets for twenty nations in the same canon when you can just make one puppet as a pov state and have the rest of those puppets detailed through dispatches, ye?

in your case i'd say that not!un thing you did and all the nations in there would count as their own things, but dudes only mentioned through colors on a map probably wouldn't

When I write lore, I just grab like twenty Wikipedia articles, become a certified expert on the topic even with minimal information on the subject available, and then try to connect them to Macronesia in some way, even if it seems impossible. You may think it impossible to connect the 1985 Nigerian coup, the shootdown of an Mi-8 humanitarian helicopter over South Sudan, and reconnaissance satellite USA-215, but believe me, it is very much possible.

People love to complain about low-effort posts in this thread, but y'all wanna know what I think the real low-effort posts are?

The ones that're just shit like 'Not a flag' in 'based on ANs flag' threads because at least one-liner or two-liner replies are still participating in the thread, at least somewhat.
