"I suppose I am conflicted on this King. He has fought for his people, and that is good, and I render honor to him for it and for his bravery demonstrated. Nonetheless, he has subjected himself to unnecessary indignation, I think. He has bent the knee to his own people, and while I understand that he may agree with the necessity of these acts, I feel his people now think he is weak. And he is being domineered by stronger friends and allies, I perceive, and his war will not be the only time. It would be a grave mistake now for him to not be ever alert, and to do so would put his kingdom in grave danger."

"Given that he rules a land of consumers and nothing more, King Christophe seems to be a spoiled brat whose countries foolish capitalist society bends to his favor. He is a monarch who delegates separate authority from his own court, with his country of working capitalists continuing to feed him the wealth and luxury that is undeserved. It is a royal status given to royalty of poor quality and minimal purpose."

"His Majesty seems like a splendid man, both with his family and his adoring citizens. Why he would endanger such a reputation with irredentism is beyond me. I mean, it is quite notable how his nation convinced so many to support his cause, but similar sentiments didn't work for Germany two decades ago. The Indochinese and Algerian emergencies with the French show that occupations are more problems than they're worth and even if you could conventionally win, destroying the objective hardly counts as winning. Oh Christophe, I think you've stepped on a country of ant-hills."

"I don't know much individually about Ascanor Wineholt Von Arcadia-Sova and Valorea Ivatollum Wineholt Von Arcadia-Sova. From what can be gathered of the functions of their government and society, I'm quite pressed to condemn them. An obsession with dark clothing and negation of some emotions aside, I can find many parallels with them and our own State before '98 or the old Tohorinese Empire. Though I would like to see capitalism as a means and not an end on itself, negating it would be suicidal in today's world...they do have many fair points though. The modern world and its meaningless transactions grossly engulfs the sublimity of far more transcendental values. A part of me would have to be forced to admit that I admire aspects of their culture."

Overall, a few bad points, and a few good, but this is to be expected with most leaders, its very rare that we encounter others that are more or less the exact same views. i dont see us having any problems with getting along if we were to build diplomacy. lets see where it goes from here..."

"I think it is wise of this "King Ascanor Wineholt Von Arcadia-Sova"- Mother, that name makes me gag- to make available to everyone else here as little as he can about himself. I try my best to do the same, yet I feel like somehow people here know more about me than I have told them. However, that is the only compliment I can give him. From what he has said to others here, and how he has judged them, he makes his character clear. He thinks he knows best on all things- not unlike a certain other figure here, though my opinion on that character has brightened over time- and he does not brook dissent in that regard. I cannot tell if he actually believes that a leader holds any obligation to their people at all, or if he thinks that a nation must rather always bow to its leaders. It seems so, as it matches his style of rule. I believe some might term it a "father-knows best" mentality, given how he seems to think that his opinions are beyond assail. His attitude towards the buying and selling of goods is that it is a childish practice is, well, childish, and lacking nuance, something even I can see. I hold a more positive view of the Lord Berghi than I do of the King. Actually, you know what- I don't need to critique this fool. He makes his people call him Almighty Ruler. That is enough critique by itself."

These people, in their near-infinite power and authority, choose to be good and just. Her origin is also the strangest origin story I have read in a while. She has not done much, but she seems like a promising figure. She is like one of those heroes you would read from tales and folklores -- virtuous, courageous and noble at heart. I hope she does well with not only her position but also her personal life, however. I see that there are still scars from the past on her."

You're somewhat more agreeable than your husband. Of course, a smart individual such as yourself would obviously advocate for rule by the intelligent and qualified. Of course, your line of thought is not wrong. If I'm setting out on a ship, I'd want the captain to be one who's qualified in sailing rather than just any old popular bum.

Still, I'm by no means an elitist and the democratic process shouldn't be limited to a select few. I'm not sure what your intentions are with such a system because most, from my own observations, prefer to throw their population under the bus and continue doing whatever they may please with no accountability whatsoever. I'm not pointing fingers but I am suspicious: Excuse my skeptic nature but I'd rather figure you out instead of offending you right off the bat. You're not like your husband and I have a bit of patience with people who aren't so clearly ravenous."

Politically, she is very ruthless but very well-meaning. i definitely approve of her being for the rights and freedoms of the individual. the brashness of the removal of these came at a surprise, but it is totally understandable as you want to do what is best to protect you people and ensure their absolute survival, i would do the same if i did not have my own defences, but my people have always been ready to put down all that to help if it ever came to such. but i digress. her views on religion and culture are fair. she is also another who wishes to stay away from the likes of socialism, which again, is perfectly fine. she leads her own way and i fully respect that decision. all i care about is keeping such differences aside and growing a friendship of other common causes, which, i would hope to earn such from her in due time, but we shall see. All that being said, she is pretty respectable and capable. here is hoping we can start off positive."

"Such a weak, degenerate communist. This 'thing' seems to violate every principal I value, so it is not worth my time. I hear it is a female, and as such must not be allowed so much political power. But I cannot enforce my personal beliefs on this foreign nation, unless I invade it. This creature doesn't contribute to our society, so it can rot for all I care. I have heard that it has opposed the Soviet Union, so that's a positive."

"With every mad tyrant I see the Humans produce, my expectations for their entire race grows lower. How can these apes expect to reach the stars when they allow degenerates like these to not only breathe, but prosper? He murders his own people because of petty differences, and uses that as an excuse for total power. The man is selfish. He doesn't care for his country. If he did, he wouldn't be ruling the country like he just conquered the place! How does it feel to do more damage to your lands than some foreign invader ever could?"

Writing this while eating parfait

"To have two leaders at once is both confusing and amusing. I, for one, would never allow the military such power in my rule. After all, it is well known the Party must grasp firmly the gun, the gun must serve the Party's interests. Therefore, I shall focus my commentary on their civilian leader."

"One's first thought is that she is more capable than many may believe her to be. She has managed to survive for so long, which is of course a feat of itself. She has struggled greatly in her life, this too I can understand, having faced troubles in the past. Yet her policies are a mixture of good ideals and lack of wisdom. Her position as a warmonger, for one, is highly concerning. Yet it is clear she has done her best for the people; or at least in her mind she has done such."
