I started writing a pocket guide to F7, anything else I should add to it?

If you reply to a "React to ANs thing" thread that involves nation stuff, make sure you actually have said thing in your own factbooks.

When in a thread with "AN's primary banner", and the AN happens to contain something vaguely anime, think of something more creative than calling them weeb.

It's an attempt at seeming cool and edgy, I guess. A bad one, given that already large parts of those who want, and fail, to be seen as cool and edgy tried that to no avail.

K-Pop is another story, as the industry behind it is genuinely terrible and many are annoyed at the stars.

OK so, I don't want to turn this thread into NSG Lite or whatever, but this is something that I genuinely do not understand.

There are always tons of articles about the dark side of K-pop or the seedy underbelly of its industry or whatever, OK yeah. Every K-pop fan, myself included, is well aware of this and, in contrast to how a lot of articles seem to paint us, we don't go 'Oh man the industry abuse is so bad but IDK man the latest TWICE single is fuckin bop so whatevs', we will criticize and discuss the problems with the industry and ways they can fix them.

But here's the thing: none of this is unique to K-pop (or J-pop, to a lesser extent), there have been and continue to be tons of scandals in Hollywood or the American music industry, for example, that are just as bad, if not worse, than some of the dark side things that come out of the K-pop industry. And yet, none of those industries have constant articles painted about the terrible dark side of Hollywood or whatever (unless something comes out like 'Famous Hollywood producer accused of sexual assault dating back to 1967 or whatever')

So like, why does K-pop constantly have the target painted on its back because of the dark side of the industry, when it's no different that probably any other form of entertainment industry? (Seriously, if you can find me an entertainment industry that isn't built on the exploitation and abuse of its performers, then I'll buy a hat and eat it) As far as I can tell, it mostly seems to be done on the basis that K-pop is foreign, it's different and therefore it must be bad.

End rant.

Literally everyone I know who dislikes anime is on the political left. In contrast, it's people on the political right who are the most prone to "YOU CANT CRITICIZE ANIME YOU FUCKING WESTERN SJW WANT TO FORCE ANIME TO BE POLITICS BY INSERTING LGBTs INTO IT!!" bullshit.

Eh, give it ten years. I for one believe that weeb's actually has one of the biggest chance of world domination, as the overlap between today's young tech or scientific geniuses and weeb's (at least based on my observation) seems to have a significant overlap. There was even a "general rule" that circulated during my time of college entrance examinations: "not all weeb's are geniuses, but all geniuses all weeb's".

There is in fact an anecdote from my country's national science and computer olympiads on how to predict its results before the olympiads even starts. During D-Day, before the competitions begin, losers will try to study to the last minutes. Winners (who already know each other since they have met and won so many competitions throughout the nation) meanwhile will group together in a corner to watch anime, and then win.

Regardless of anything, we can at least all agree that angry anime YouTubers making videos about how 'The LEFT is TRIGGERED and OUTRAGED by this character' when it's like, at most, some people calling a character's design dumb or offering genuine criticisms about their design is the most annoying shit.

But they are almost never genuine criticisms... If anything, it's just complaints in general.

And this is from watching the non politically charged videos making fun of those people and the people who go up in arms over every little thing related to anime and/or Japan and/or V-Tubers.

Yes, the problem is that a lot of anime criticism and complaints are mixed together, and some are very hard to distinguish. Anime is generally the same thing as "American" cartoons, and so is their communities. Character development and details are pretty highly regarded in anime.
