Going back to actual clichés - thank you - though not exactly F7-related, sorry.

There's a reason why there's a single report thread, like damn. A spammer pops up and everyone lost their minds and made 5+ separate threads on the same dude.

Panic can be a great humor material, sometimes.

I'm surprised people still try to make small talk in Moderation threads, when it's clear that the mods don't like clutter.

Hey hey, LP here: Too burnt out with this nation to make new lore or fix macrohistorical longue durée alt-his inconsistencies, too clingy to let it die.

And a lot of them are relatively older nations.

I know it's tempting, but RESIST, dammit! If you reply and clutter with chaos, trolls win. And you make a cute animal cry.

Something similar happens whenever the forum crashes. There will always be one, usually new, who will open a thread on that. If all goes well, in Technical; otherwise on the first subforum he finds.

This is more of a 'nation type I rarely see' but there are very few 'USSR but it managed to be reformed by Gorby and didn't collapse and still exists' nations. I only know of one nation fitting that concepts (and IDK if they're even still here), every other modern USSR nation I've seen is literally just 'USSR but it survives to the modern day and is still an authoritarian single-party state'.

Of course, now that I've said this, I expect a bunch of examples that I didn't know about. 🤔

I mean, of course the USSR's principles of vanguardism generally meant that it was difficult to adapt Marxist-Leninist ideology to a multi-party structure, which is why I understand people who still have a generally classic USSR in the modern day. In a way, for the USSR to properly survive as a socialist state, it HAD to maintain a one-party structure.

This is why Ruskiya Svyachena makes so much sense to me, wherein Gorbachev reformed the USSR, and it kind of just slipped away into a free market system anyway.

I mean the question remains on whether or not it would continue to remain vanguardist. Or really, even Marxist-Leninist. I genuinely doubt it would have an end as relatively bloodless as it did irl if the USSR was not to abandon Marxism-Leninism in its entirety.

And that's the thing. Without Marxism-Leninism, what was the USSR? The whole thing's governance was practically defined by ideology, and I just don't think it could have persisted as socialist without keeping ML.

Damn....sorry about the thing that happened in the "Ask AU a question thread"...I think I was the catalyzer there. Normally I try my best to edit my original response, but after the forumside ping mechanism was discontinued (or maybe I'm just technologically illiterate), I try to make it obvious that I replied to the person that was before me.

But yeah, F7 is in for a long summer of one liners and people unintentionally ignoring forum etiquette. I think that's why I stopped visiting the Factbook threads. I try my best to say that sometimes the other person can't be blamed for low-effort replies, some people are busy IRL, after all and I've skimmed over more than a few factbooks myself too.

the idea of a "superhero" is very strictly imo tied to both individual characters and shiny explosions, something that a text medium centered around structures on the scale of entire nations doesn't lend itself well to. however, there's quite a few leader characters I might call "superheroes" within that framework.

There is one example I can recall. Strictly speaking a certain DOS also had a character that can be classified as a state-sanctioned superhero in a WWII sort of way. I wouldn't call either a good execution to be honest.

To be honest the general reason is that while character-based limited roleplaying is a staple of F7 (i.e. leader threads and all that), you can do a lot more with a leader character than you can with a superhero. I guess unless you're like making an NS about the Watchtower or some such. Heh, there's an idea.

These reformed USSR nations often incorrectly assume the entire USSR was Russian, or was willing to fully assimilate to Russian culture. A USSR remaining to the present day as a single party state but it's a mess of violent separatist insurgencies and ethnic conflicts would be a lot pretty interesting but nobody wants to do that. Because writing character based narratives about an exhausted KGB counter terrorist team is too hard when you can power wank and spam Su-57s and T-14s to every irrelevant brush fire conflict around the world.

Oh, I've been busy at work with Charles and Tepka/Nu-Montse in rough drafts to make their story more appealing to me (making it cheesier and more low-brow) and have been wondering about the whole "framework" question. The issue of political intrigue and institutions block away "shiny explosions" in the context of a mostly realistic setting where actions have consequences. Especially in a modern constitutional democracy where respectability of symbolic figures is expected.

Though curiously, I came to realize that my favorite hero who'd I base Charles on is basically a thieving asshole despite what his theme song may say. Maybe I can pull it off in the Solar Remnant considering how hammy the setting is.

If you're not gonna be realistic, you may as well own it. ͡°(ಠ_ಠ)͡°

Trying it with Tohorin's Rairai, though it's very protagonist-centered and doesn't go beyond "because my bosses said so" or "for my clan's honor" or even "I don't wanna die." Not much of a comic book guy. I suck at making entirely pure characters almost as much as I can't bring myself to write completely amoral and monstrous characters.

Why not both? Shooting at baddies in the face with .44-40 six-shooters in well-laid out ambushes is fun.

There's so much potential for this if people want to work character based narrative into their war RPs. But no let's just post one liners where we spam numbers. And not even through the perspective of a general, through the perspective of some omnipotent force akin to the player in EU4.

'WHER E IS SEASON 3 CARDS?' 'When is season 3 of cards happening?' 'Any update on season 3 of trading cards?'

Look, I get that the NS trading cards are a popular feature and it has been said been said by the admins that will remain a permanent feature but don't y'all think the admin team (who reminder are just volunteers) have more pressing shit to do than work on the new season of the April Fools' feature from 2018? I'm not saying it'll never happen but come on.

As a random aside, who else remembers when NationStates would play actual pranks on April Fools' and not just minigame stuff? I totally get why they switched to minigames (the reaction to the 2011 prank was extremely negative) but I kinda miss the pranks.
