"Anastasia, what an interesting figure you are. Say, wasn't Anastasia that princess that got shot by them Russian Commies? Never thought I would see that name repeated in an uncontroversial figure such as yourself. Well... I guess I wouldn't say that. You do have some... witchcraft-like powers, which I am unsure if I can fully approve of. Aaand you did lose your home, blown to smithereens by a race far beyond even the comprehensions of the smartest of your people. I'd make a joke 'bout losing a war to the Jay-Yes-es, but I won't mock. Losing my home was one of my worst fears.

But, I ain't gonna make this about myself. If the Valentinians say you're alright enough to become their 'personification', then you're alright enough for me. Shame about your kingdom, it sounded like quite the nice place. But hey! You get to live with Valentijn and Clarissa. Shame what happened to the peasants, but hey, now you're hanging out with the most powerful, politically connected, and coolest Emperors on this side of the multiverse.

... Shit, your names Valentina, isn't it? My bad. You Valentinians have some weird names."

It's good to be back, Muller said to himself as he sat on the slide doors of a moving Bo 115 helicopter. The gentle breeze swept his face as he adjusted his green beret to clear his line of sight. With a hunting rifle by his hand, Muller was intent on hunting some exotic African animals in the jungles of Tanzania. He paid off some corrupt Tanzanian officials to allow passage to his LIT cohorts in reaping the riches of the Tanzanian jungle. But what was supposed to be a hunt for rhinos turned into a partisan hunt as RPF rebels emerged out of the bushes and fired upon his chopper. "Well, boys, we're hunting for partisans today" as Muller smiled to himself.

*Lifts up his ten gallon hat*

"Howdy, partner, the name's Muller around these parts. You must be Jerry. I have heard tales of your exploits in the post-apocalypse and believe me, I would crave for nuclear arrageddon because it only means more challenges. Now, Jerry, what's with you feeling stressed and shit. It is unbecfitting of a wandering king. There's always greener pasture, Jerry; places to invade and conquer instead of drowning your sorrows in some shitty wasteland bar. You may stand for justice, Jerry, but justice and playing hero in these parts of the wasteland will often get you killed for little reward. The mercenaries of Ruanda only do things we do for money and the thrill of war. I'm doing what I love while getting paid as well as giving my enemies my services and seems like playing king in the wasteland is going to expose you to a lot of enemies wanting to crush your kingdom"

"But there's always Whataburger to fall back on if your kingly ventures didn't go the way as you expected."

~ Siegfried 'Kongo' Muller, Chief Executive of Ruanda-Urundi

"I'm not sure how I feel about a mercenary ruling over a country in Africa... Considering the unstable political climate of Africa. However, I am impressed that Mr. Muller was able to maintain order. According to his information page, he is not interested in trying to 'civilize' Africa which sounds good by itself. But I do have a problem that he is just there to profit from Ruanda and make it into a colony for European corporations... Which just sounds like imperialism with a different name. So far my opinion is neutral on him and slightly leaning negative." -Prime Minister Amelia Larson

"Long ago, there was a Cala of a tribe involved in one of the coalitions in the final war. This Cala was new to the post and admittedly unskilled in the arts of war, but he won several battles against superior foes and came to be recognized for his successes. However, on the eve of the enemy routing from the region, the Cala's son was killed in battle. Though the enemy was driven from the region, the death of his son hit him hard, and he resolved to prevent any other children from facing the same fate. He pulled out of the coalition, and his tribe went on their own way.

"Not long after, his tribe encountered another enemy legion. Though the first legion had been driven out of the area, this did not mean that all of the legions had been driven out. He attempted to avoid a fight, but was inevitably forced into one nonetheless. His ill preparation cost many lives, and he died with his back to the enemy.

"In a way, I see this tale in you. It was a tragedy, losing your child in such a way. It is not a thing that I would wish upon others. I suspect however that it has colored your outlook in general. In backing away from conflict you might show wisdom, but in backing away entirely from your allies, you leave yourself open to assault from other forces. It is good that you wish to see to the needs of your people, but you must be more prudent in your dealings with other nations." -Cala Vermuth Iron Tiger

What respect does he deserve as a soldier, when he abandoned the warpath in favour of spineless lobbying? As a statesman, when he incessantly works to sap his nation's collective strength? None. He strips and reinstates wealth as he sees fit, from and to those he finds in some way deserving, and yet he does this through no power of his own; merely the collective unwillingness of the sheep he calls citizens to do anything about it. While I'm sure that the inspector has the correct skills for his position, I'm still awfully surprised that those who surround him are continually impressed by him. Is there some sort of formula of fear, compromise and persistence that you've managed to concoct and apply successfully?

I can understand the value of authoritarianism during hard times but to revolve your entire society around a few elites? Is this a game to you? A sociological experiment? What exactly are striving for? Total control? If you believe that you can continue with this static form of rule, you're setting yourself up for failure. If you keep the apple on the counter for too long, it's going to rot from the inside and soon enough, some hungry worms are going to tunnel into it from outside. I hope you understand what I mean by this analogy. Nothing is eternal so learn to ride the waves or drown. Do you honestly believe in a meritocracy? Because let's just say that in any meritocratic system worth its salt, no one's going to ever give you the reins to any organization that has an effect on people."

QUOTE

"I have come to realize over my time here that you people are positively addicted to moral grandstanding. Well, it could be worse- Victoria could have baselessly assumed I was a cannibal and insinuated I was a whore who enjoyed murdering children when we first met, like some people did. However I do not think I can judge you all too harshly for it- we are all in our own ways predisposed to believe in our own superiority. And you people certainly have the success to support your claims. Van Carstein I have spoken on already; I have no quarrel with her. Don't know how she ever accomplished... certain things, but I have no quarrel with her. Hoffmeister, though... she's the most accomplished of the lot in terms of haughtiness and possessing an ego the size of a fucking planet, but nonetheless she has demonstrated she is an excellent warrior. If I were to die by her hand I would die satisfied, I think."

-You're an asshole. Now kill me, please. Before she does.
