a sort of reverse-trope that i dislike: making your fantasy world with generic fantasy races ahoy, but then just taking those generic races and instead of rolling with it and making something cool, having to throw in a single massive twist out of left field like MY ELVES ARE SILICON-BASED LIFEFORMS that was intended to make them "distinct" from other fantasy settings but just doesn't add anything to worldbuilding beyond complexity that impacts the story in no functional way.

i'm kind of guilty of this in a setting i actually decided would be fun to write as of... thirty seconds ago, but that's more because i had a dream about "the age of empires but the european-analogue nations are all run by kobolds" i should really not read king leopold's ghost right before bed because if i do i have a dream about king leokobold's ghost and kobolds colonizing the dark continent and then i have to make that into prewriting despite my better judgement

I suppose it's a trope in alternate history and geopolitics games in general, but the trope of Rome or the Byzantines inexplicably never falling and becoming massive modern globe spanning nationstates despite no clear change to tactics or politics. Instead it's usually either that some group of soldiers in some battle just fight harder, or they just somehow miraculously raise 40 new armies.

Here's one, but I suffer from it too. There's always a punching bag in worldbuilding. A country that is both cartoonishly evil enough that nobody likes it, that is so outrageously, comically "bad" enough that it can't garner support, and that is so utterly stupid in its actions that nothing it does goes right. They're always starving, there's no infrastructure to speak of, they're failing in their missions (losing 3 trillion soldiers to 2 garrison guardians with a spear after 17 months of battle), their armaments fail to blow, or blow where they're not supposed to, and there's somehow a united front against them by countries that would be ideologically opposed enough one might side with said evil country irl.

What you just described almost sounds like North Korea, except the united front part.

Does anyone here have to find a picture before writing up their character? Or that just a me thing? Because it seems I can't physically begin writing a backstory for my character until I find or get a picture commissioned for my characters.

Other way around for me. Can't find a picture for a character before I write them at least a little bit.

North Korea is a nuclear state that actually has a pretty large base of supporters all around the West that go as far as to suggest that everything bad about it is just propaganda. Imagine North Korea, but not only is it shitty, the only reason it exists is also because South Korea is a gudboi that doesn't want to break international law by unifying the country, that China has closed its borders to them and shoots poor North Koreans escaping from the northern borders, that been limited to only 5 kilometers far from its coasts with an ever-vigilant, ever-present global coalition blockade shooting every ship they send away, etc. etc.

The F-22 is a pretty big offender here, but so are American bombers. The amount of times I see B-52s, B-2s and B-1s being used is almost comical. If you want a bomber, the US and Russia aren't going to be exporting their strategic bombers to you. Best you'll get is something like the F-111 or Tu-22 if you want a bomber, or more likely you'll go the fighter-bomber route with something like the Strike Eagle or Tomado.

It's a mix for me. Most of the time I wrote the lore first then the picture. If I do the vice-versa, I found that I tend to fit the lore of that Valentian too much to the original source of that game.

So if I have the appearance first (e.g. Elizabeth from Bioshock Infinite), I found it slightly more difficult to wrap my lore around that. I think I should just go with the lore and make the picture the secondary.

Inverted Atlantis has even sorta been done, but no major straight-and-out Atlantis nations!

I HAVE BEEN SUMMONED

I love the theme and even wrote a report about it, read several books about it, Nadia: The Secret of Blue Water (which revolves around Atlantis and ancient aliens) is probably my favorite anime, I planned to make my thesis about the historiography of Atlantis in out-dated theories (before I switched to something less demanding) and I had a WW2 page dedicated to ancient artifact recollection as LP was the Atlantis beyond the Pillars of Hercules that collapsed before the Egyptian Old Kingdom...but I ret-coned it and stuck to teasing about the theme.

That year I got really busy organizing a conference over potsherds in archaeology...so ironically...the history archaeology took me away from the (fictional) history of archaeology and I forgot about it. A shame too. Looking back at old sketches, I envisioned a circular pyramid being on a round hill in an islet on the Home Islands Shiryu Lagoon (based on the round pyramid in Cuicuilco) and even designed a monolith and characters. Funnily enough, though I thought up a story that more or less rehashes plot elements of Indiana Jones and the Fate of Atlantis involving a "magical cursed dragon egg" (a plutonium core) that cursed it's bearers to illness after it was uncovered by a Conquistador.

But I thought the whole "Occult Hyperborean Nazis" in Akakor thing was over-used and too predictable, despite being neat. And though I really wanted to place the story in the American Southwest to take advantage of the RL Narvaéz, Cabeza de Vaca and late-Cortes and Oñate expeditions looking for golden cities, it was inconsistent and difficult to pull off in the plot...so I put the action in Madagascar to prop up lore over Mu and made the Japanese the villains.

I've still got a few sketches still, if you wanna see...

Last edited by Las Palmeras on Tue Feb 23, 2021 9:28 am, edited 1 time in total.
