If you're alluding to what I think you're alluding to: they weren't doxxed. In a moment of anger I reminded someone that they had once admitted to something which was bad enough to get all their posts nuked from the site following confirmation by the mods that they had in fact admitted to this. This was a long-standing open secret in much of the RP community that I and many others (who had some years before then been involved in a similar incident with an off-site admission and a different player) had previously believed there was no on-site, actionable evidence for.

Honestly, most NSers don't even specify how much they spend on military.

Which while I get it might not be a big issue seeing how most NS militaries don't even have anything other than "here's our Guns, MBTs, and active combat personnel," it becomes a mild issue when the nation is a liberal republic with low taxes and yet has 5% of its population in active service (for context, that's a similar rate to North Korea), 2,000 tanks, and free healthcare.

Because that's totally sustainable and won't lead to a military-industrial complex hidden behind a curtain of lies and corruption. (though, admitting that this is the case is based.)

I was reminded of this article with regards to the military and the spending. Not exactly the best of sources, but I love the way it's phrased. Enjoy! 😊

Cracked.com, 5 Myths about Nazis people still believe today, wrote:

Output for the state was always the priority. Unions were forced into the German Labor Front, which saw a 15 percent increase in working hours, falling wages for front-line workers, increased industrial accidents, and blacklisting if you questioned these conditions. And it wasn't just the working class getting the short shrift, as a big part of the supposed economic miracle was made possible by that fun old Nazi concept of forced labor. Work camps existed well before the war began, papered over with some talk about how they were offering prisoners the "dignity of work."

All of this plus massive levels of debt and the takeover of an economically challenged Austria meant that the Nazi economy was already falling apart by 1939. By 1941, when they couldn't pillage enough steel and oil from Russia, they were doomed. America could "solve" unemployment tomorrow if we stuck everyone in the army and started making nothing but tanks and ammo, but it's the economic equivalent of setting your house on fire because you're cold.

Without going into a NSG-esque discussion, I mean, it does work, but eventually, you are not going to eat tanks and shells for breakfast. Even in a fictional world.

EDIT: There's also Adam Tooze's Wages of Destruction: The Making and Breaking of the Nazi Economy.

Hey, to change the subject away from turning this thread into NSG filial:

A grunt or something with a lot of PTSD (often written wrong)

If I can trace the amounts of money I spent just in these 6 months, I spent the US economy times ten, just to deter my old nation, Crabaiaia from attacking me.

Oh yeah, that's always a fun fact

Fascist Economies (In this case the German variant of Fascism) are normally screwed, even moreso than authoritarian socialist ones. People get jobs, sure, but wages typically lower along with working conditions. While there was an increase in overall wage, this was because of hours worked rather than actual wage increase. Not to mention, as all trade unions were banned except for state-controlled ones, it's not like the working class had any means of speaking out. Not to mention, due to both the irrationally hostile foreign policy and focus on military production, some items (including clothing) had to be rationed. Which mind you, is kinda silly considering the fact Germany was supposedly the most industrialized power on Earth. (According to the Germans, of course.)

Also, as a unrelated fun fact I learned while researching fascist economies: people who employed a maid in Nazi Germany could (supposedly) count the maid as a "dependent" and thusly got a tax break. Not the Maid, the person hiring the maid.

I fuckin miss NSTracker since it could actually calculate how many people would be in your military based on what percentage you chose and even show you the other effects on your economy if you had a lot of people in. Don't think you could do some thing stupid like 'Yeah 70% of our population is in the military/ but if you set it to like 15-20% of your adult population being in the military, it'd fuck your economy.

The optimal number for an all-volunteer force is 0.2% of the population, since RoN (that Robloxified HOI IV) tends to exaggerate capabilities by ten. IIRC

I noticed alot of people are confused about forum terminology and etiquette. Yes, new people have trouble with it (summerposters especially), but there's a few older users who also don't know (not naming names, that'd be cruel on my part). Am I weird, because I figured things out pretty quickly....

Well it doesn't help that there are instances of forum terms changing their meaning for seemingly no reason whatsoever.

Like, since you used the term, I still don't understand when or why the term 'summerposter' changed in meaning from 'a teenager on summer vacation from school who just comes this site in an attempt to try and troll it' to 'a (usually new) player who makes low-effort posts on the forum', especially since the term 'noob' already exists.

Not on the list, but my favorite is the Nazi Uberweapons and their nuclear program.

Banning "Judenphysik" and competing R&D projects made with the same goal but who compete over the same resources (apparently a feature and not a bug of Nazism) aside, Heisenberg and friends seemed to believe that nuclear reactions were self-stabilizing and no planned German reactors had control rods or a reliable kill-switch for when they reached criticality.
