This is one of the reasons I almost never write characters, I honestly just don't like character RP because poorly written characters ruined it for me. That and I can't write people for shit, one of the many perks of being the social equivalent of an empty void.

I've always enjoyed an emphasis on characters a bit more because you get to toy around with characterization, character arcs, and relevant tropes and plotlines. It also lets you give a face to the suffering caused by war or to more tender and uplifting moments beyond the geopolitical games nations play. Milsperg, in my mind, treats war too much like a game and that can remove some of the gravity from it and flatten out a lot of the interesting themes and sincere brilliance you can catch glimpses of through character role-play.

Why not both? Write a character who's a JTAC and then write out the entire radio dialogue of them performing the full nine-line to call in air support. Or sperg out hard on the carbines your special operators are carrying and sperg on small unit tactics while also being able to develop them as people.

Yeah nobody really wants to do character based stuff for war, they just want to slam stat blocks together like they're playing a Paradox game. It's not like people have to characterize the hundreds of thousands of troops in their army, just characterizing a few officers is often enough to bring the wars to a more personal level.

Punching bag characters can be pretty compelling though so long as they don't get killed off as part of someone else's power fantasy immediately. Who

Good, well-written characters with developed arcs can change things up though. There are quite a few posters on II who are well-known for their incredible skill in writing emotionally engaging stories which often always require characters. There are also some pretty famous RP characters among the II community as well

damn fahran making me write serious responses 🙄

Personally, I'm on the fence with this. I have no issue with treating war in II like a game at times. NS is a game, after all, and when we have war in NS it is part of that game. At the same time, I do think that people who just do milsporg with literally nothing else [if you want to see some milsporg + good character writing I honestly recommend reading some of PPC's posts] are a bit tiring. Of course, it's good if you're just doing a military RP but emoting even a tiny bit is still important. Character RP has its moments in war RP, generally, but at the same time it can become a bit boggy if all you do is talk about what X and Y characters are doing when what's ultimately important is the status of the units in that region.

My aspiration on NS is to combine milsporg with at the very least decent quality character writing and descriptions of larger strategic operations beyond "I send 20 stealth bombers to bomb your capital". But finding an open RP where I'm not expected to make 10+ posts a day and can compete with a military that's small by NS standards but would be in the top 10 largest armed forces IRL, that's tough.

To be fair, really not that difficult if you look hard enough. And the best thing about NS is that if you don't like any current running RPs you can always set up your own RP with folks you know.

I wouldn't mind OP escapism too much if characters weren't too impeccable from the very start. Seeing a character lose and commit mistakes makes them more relatable. As you said, characterization is important and it'd offer a lot in terms of potential character development.

But yeah, it's kinda fun to play as the under-dog sometimes, especially on a national scale. It makes you justify why they're around to begin with.

I rather just call in solo wing pixy as a merc and give him the best plane instead whenever I have to fight a Ace Combat themed nation. It solves the RP congruency and lore at the same time.

One of the oldest and most numerous clichés are Nations heavily based upon Germany in either the 1910s or 1930s/1940s.

Hathian Prime does not use NS Stats.

HP and all other nations take place in an AU. HP is not Germany.

You can do quite a bit with a few lines of dialogue usually. It's a bit of work, but you don't have to fully flesh out every character for them to be compelling or believable. Leaning into tropes can lessen the weight on an RPer's shoulders even more since a lot of characters tend to slide into similar relational dynamics (five-man band, etc.).

Same, I completely agree. While listing troop movements and strategy is important, it's much easier to relate to events through the eyes of, say, a private who's been conscripted, perhaps an innocent civilian caught in the crossfire, maybe even the status of the leaders at the top

Something I notice with conflicts on NS, they all seem to be ideologically based, even when there are internal conflicts. Nobody really seems to do ethnic conflict or religious conflict. It's always communists vs fascists or capitalists vs communists or something.

I'll never understand the usage of SCPs as military weapons. Like, they'll just kill your own men too. On top of that, there's other issues. In order to counteract them killing your own men, wouldn't you have to abandon your positions to effectively use them? Then, you would have to waste men to try and re-contain them after you set them loose.
