Depends what the hospital/clinic that you stole from wants to do. Obviously, since it's medical equipment, they'd press charges, meaning that you'd have to pay hefty settlements and, depending on how urgently necessary the equipment was in context, as well as in a likely context, go to prison for a while.

Generally not illegal since the government doesn't care about guns. Just have to be performing the mandatory background checks and such. Knowingly selling a firearm to a felon can land you in prison for a while.

There are no motorcades here, they're far from being invented yet. Throwing a rock in the direction of the King or his entourage would could result in anything from a flogging, stockade or even death.

Blasphemy.

Tax fraud.

personal income tax fraud is punishable usually by fines 50% the income + the underpayment for 6 months

This meant that if your monthly salary is 60K your tax is 13.2k and lets say you cut some corners to only pay 8k: for the next 6 months you will have to pay 5.2k extra for the next 6 months and 30k fine

Business tax frauds will land the business owner in prison for at least 5 years per count + fines levied on the business owner and the company itself and a bad national credit rating for the company for the next 10 years (meaning it's hard for them to get a loan and investment)

we can dive deeper, but for BN:
>public indecency

Apart from the amount of money that the culprit hasn't paid (which will be taken from him), a fine of up to 25 times the amount of money they haven't paid (i.e. for $1,000 it'd be between $0 to $25,000), and for every $1,000 in taxes not paid, a month in prison, in both cases the punishment is at the discretion of the jury and the judge.

AN: Up to 3 weeks in jail and up to $2,000 in fines, plus mandatory psychological therapy

Depends on the desertion itself; on what basis was it done? Was it from the military, the government, some civil-service, school? Can go from not being a crime to a long stay in prison.

Depends on economic status. Sentences can be as severe as the death penalty for the poor while the rich can easily get away with tax fraud with impunity.
