A... trope/diche (?) to avoid or just to start doing: Use your own photos as reference and maybeeee do some Photoshop goodness.

I think it's one thing to just use your own photos*, but there is another thing entirely to use multiple photos you have shot and make something entirely different with Photoshopping. I am definitely giving this a shot.

Shameless plug, I did it for a thread I am running. Photo was from my walk around Singapore:

I mean to a degree because if it was "Well-written" it wouldn't become a DPRK-style nation lol. I legit wouldn't believe DPRK existed -with these conditions and its human rights abuses, etc- if I didn't know it existed, I'd swear it was just a saturday morning cartoon or something lol

Not particularly.

Same thing with the DPRK- when you understand how it came into existence it makes much more sense. But if you look at it as an established entity alone, and ignore its history and shaping factors that led to it being such a fucking hellhole, then yeah- it shouldn't come as a surprise that most of the edgy nations that are "too edgy to exist" and fail to pull it off on this site just look at things in the present and don't examine history.

I guess it's more like North Korea has reasons why it got that way. If it were a work of fiction, it would have fleshed out worldbuilding that describes why and how it became evil. Versus a lot of NS evil nations that are evil just because, with no explanation as to why.

Speaking of, this is something that's not a cliché as it's the first I've really seen of it: the caveats in Sengoku's factbooks to, basically, not try this at home! Such as how SRC's governing system is explicitly called out as, "Warning: The following system has never been tried in the real world, so I strongly discourage anyone from applying it to any actual nation."

Out of context, I think such warnings might seem blunt, but in context they actually rhetorically add to the text, helping ease readers into both processing the serious dreadfulness of the balkanized-U.S. situation (the conflicts, deaths, etc.) while simultaneously easing into the more optimistic present of SRC and PRC, where the leaders are quite pleasant people who are good to hang out with.

Perhaps I just notice it so much because it feels like another approach to what I tried to do by implication. With a motto like "checks and imbalances" and a policymaking bureaucracy so explicitly difficult to wrap the mind around, I try to imply Baizou's flaws and probably real-world impracticality in spite of the in-character success it's experiencing (which is in many senses on account of my own desire to write happy characters in a decent place and have some respite from the world ^^; ).

I guess I've kinda rambled about things that aren't clichés... ^^;

Oh, there is a completely unrelated cliché I was thinking about. It's not that surprising, but I think most users in the "Which Party from the AN would you vote for?" trend toward choosing center-ish parties. Ah, but then again, I guess that's not really a cliché so much as it is a reflection of a tendency in the userbase toward avoiding extremity, whether actual or perceived?

Hm, I've considered writing another prose piece about Yuu to try to explore negative colonial externalities on Baizou's Po-Usikwa. While I'm open about preferring to use Baizou to produce lighter fictional fare, it may be worthwhile to take a further look at the colonial realities Baizou has quite probably experienced with both medieval Japanese settlement (which is a different kind of colonialism, but still involves settlement, displacement, political dislocation, etc.) and long-term English/British occupation. I mostly push that stuff to the background, but I'd like to explore at least some of those "bad side effects, m'kay" at some point.

It would definitely be an interesting chance to show how societies aren't a monolithic in-group and how rivalries over the cultural purity of leaders in the metropole and colonists often happen IRL. Sounds very interesting.

In LP's case, the example is a lot more racialized because of the Spanish Empire's social hierarchy. And things only get bloodier as I wanna make it clear that Tohorinese colonists of the Caribbean were climate refugees from the Little Ice Age (which was drying up the Home Island at the time) and were fighting for their lives. I also want to take the opportunity to show how sometimes decision making by policy-men isn't always rational or profit-driven, by modern Western standards at least. The Tohorinese were still somewhat "Medieval" in the 18th Century.

All ideology, centrism included, has become subject to reddit's tendencies.

The only conceivable solution is anti-ideology: i.e., the destruction of the politics and assimilation of all individuals into undifferentiated human matter. The only way to escape reddit is hivemind collectivism.

National Bolshevism != Marxism-Leninism. They're actually much more separate than many give them credit for, and I hate the conflation of "ML/Nazbol". They aren't close enough for it to be a mere rebrand.

My Government is like, low to middle tier evil. I have however had the government's views and actions have lead to a good chunk of the immigrants emigrating and causing a mini economic crisis (I will never confirm whether or not the government intentionally caused it.), it has also caused widespread protests which has become an Armed Insurrection.
