Their Prime Minister is Barack Obama, and their fighter jets consist of "pilots" outfitted with aircraft-shaped costume props. On a more serious note, there is an ongoing democracy movement advocating for less restrictions on the political process, as while the economy and people's personal lives have been subjected to less rigid control in recent years than in the past, political freedom is still quite low and the Constitution's outlined "fundamental rights" don't actually offer much protection from the state in practice.

I used to think that too: a lot of the electronics I had growing up were Japanese. So I wondered what a truly tech-savvy Japan would look like.

Over the coming years, Foulke fought in various conflicts with his aircraft of choice, the F-15C Eagle. During one particular battle in 1993, his F-15's right wing was torn off by enemy fire, but he remained in control of the aircraft and safely returned to base. This incident earned him the nickname "Solo Wing". He later painted the right wing of his aircraft—either the same Eagle or a replacement—a scarlet red to commemorate the incident.

Also, hair dying as a way to form class distinctions is an awesome idea, wow!

Edit:

Apparently, the Dutch words 'waterschappen' and 'hoogheemraadschappen' mean 'regional water authorities' and 'water boards' respectively which, in my mind, is the exact opposite of what I was expecting, so that's really cool!
