Despite being the ultra-modern country they are, their economy is still led by the trout farming industry.

I thought their name was just a combination of the towns of Minsk and Kiev, yet I was incorrect. It is based on the name of a river and their founder.

He's competent in his field, but he does have blind spots in other areas. That is why he argued for splitting leadership as he did. No one person can do everything.

They are a constitutional monarchy in the Mediterranean, currently engaging in a war for Tunisia. They're backed by Westerners and Tunisia is backed by the Arab world. Their government has switched between liberals and conservatives since the inception of Carthage's democracy in 1899.

They are a huge federal republic with decent political freedoms and a strong economy. This ensures a good life for many of the citizens, though the dominant-party system does hinder the choice of government given to voters.
